CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-SIXTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

very much the largest proportion of the fund. They had a very active gentleman, a priest, who gave his personal attention to the Indian schools, and I must say for him that he did everything in very excellent manner. In that way, as I say, the Catholic Church succeeded.

But, Mr. President, when this complaint grew up I was one of those who believed it was better, in answer to that demand, that we should cease the contract school system whenever we could secure buildings and opportunities for the Indian children in the Government schools. Now, there seems to be a question whether that can be done at present. The chairman of the committee tells us that it can be; the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says it can be; but Senators here do not believe it can be done—that the Indian children can be taken care of in Government schools.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion right there?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. This amendment will be absolutely inoperative if the Government buildings will be sufficient to take care of the children. It is dependent absolutely on whether the Government schools can or can not take care of the children.

Mr. TELLER. I understand that; and I have not any particular objection to the Senator's amendment, except that I know it will never be incorporated into the law, even if it should be passed here. I want something practical, if we are going to do anything at all, or else we might as well allow it to go. I think the substitute I have offered will, perhaps, give the Secretary some authority that he has not now. I think he will feel that he has some authority; but what he will do I do not know. I think that must be left to his discretion.

I believe just as I have said before, that if the church authorities who are displaced—I believe that applies principally now only to the Catholic Church—are willing to sell their school buildings, the Government ought to buy them; and if they are not and propose, as was stated by the chairman of the committee, to maintain the schools, I think it is a charity that is very commendable in them. I believe, however, that the Government Indian school is just as good as any other school. I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that a day school is practically of little value. The boarding schools, instead of the day schools, are the schools where the children get their education, where they learn to work, and where they become civilized.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in the State of Montana we have about 12,000 Indians. Some forty or fifty years ago those Indians, or the tribes they represent, held complete sway over the territory now embraced within that State. In the gradual development of our civilization they have been relegated to reservations. It is contemplated, as I understand, to ultimately embody these Indians in the citizenship of that State. The progress in this behalf has been somewhat slow and unsatisfactory; but still some progress has been made. We have now within the limits of the State, in the Flathead, the Blackfeet, the Belknap, the Cheyenne, the Fort Peck, and Crow Indian agencies, according to the most moderate estimate made, 1,743 children of school age.

There is no pretense nor is there any shadow of pretense that the Government supplies school facilities or accommodations, nor is there any pretense that the Government can, during the next fiscal year, supply school accommdations for more than 670 of those children. The total school population of these various reservations, as I have suggested, is 1,743. The total capacity of the Government boarding schools and the Government day schools is 670; leaving unprovided with school facilities or advantages of any kind 1,073 of those children.

On the reservation to which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] referred in such graphic terms there are children of school age entitled to the advantages of education, if this Government wishes to discharge its trust, numbering 398; and on that reservation to-night the Government of the United States has not school facilities for a single solitary child.

The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] proposes that, where the Government can not provide school facilities for those children, the Secretary of the Interior, the responsible agent of the Government in this behalf, may contract with existing schools, such schools as the Senator from Missouri has described, to continue those children under the tutelage and with the maintenance of proper persons for the next fiscal year, not at a greater or larger figure than that which the Government provides in its own schools, or the expense which is incurred in caring for and maintaining children, but at a less figure than the Government has ever been able to educate and maintain children of this class. The Senator from Arkansas does not provide that this shall be done if the Government has school facilities, but his amendment provides that it may be done if the Government can not, in its own schools, through its own teachers, provide educational facilities for and maintain those children.

Now, the mere question propounded to the Senate to-day is, Will the Government of the United States, under the burden of a sacred trust to these Indian children, absolutely deny unto them all educational advantages rather than avail itself, for the time being, of such as may be obtained under contract? If it is the desire of the Government to turn these children upon the open plain, to deny them any school advantages, let that be generally understood, and let us abandon the entire system of Indian education. If 670 of these children are to be provided with school education and maintenance, and 1,073 are to be deprived of it, I pray you select the 670 out of the reservations to whom the benefits of an education should be extended, and select those to whom it should be denied.

Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] suggested that it was highly improper to utilize, employ, or engage the public Treasury or its funds in advancing the interests of any church organization in this country. Who can be found upon this floor to debate that question with the Senator from Massachusetts? From the foundation of this Government to this hour, in every Congress, and all the time the people of this country have insisted that there should be an absolute and unqualified separation of church and state. One of the basic principles upon which this Government was founded, as contradistinguished from the governments of Europe, rested upon the separation of church and state. Nowhere within the history of the Republic can we find a party that has ever insisted for a moment upon this undesirable alliance.

But, Mr. President, underlying our Government there existed another principle, and it was ingrafted into the Constitution, the fundamental law of the land, that no religious test should ever be required. So that, whether it be in a State legislature, a town council, the House of Representatives, or the Senate, no religious test can be required of any individual seeking public place or employment in the public service.

We appropriate from year to year amounts in the aggregate running to about $20,000,000 on the average for rivers and harbors. The contracts for the performance of this work are let to the lowest responsible bidders. Who has ever inquired as to the religion of the contractor? Who has ever been heard in this Chamber or elsewhere to apply the test of religion to the man who was going to dredge a harbor? The individual who would apply that test would be considered of unsound mind. What is the difference between the dredging of a harbor and the elevation of the North American Indian? I wish to inquire if any Senator in this presence knows of any form of the Christian religion that will injuriously affect a North American Indian? Can you conceive of any religion that will lower the condition of a blanket Indian?

Mr. President, we are the successors upon this continent of those people whom our forefathers found in possession. A remnant of the tribes remains on the Western frontier, or what remains of that frontier. We are charged, as by a solemn and sacred trust, to elevate, ennoble, educate, and Christianize, as best we may, what remains of this unfortunate race. This trust we can not discharge by declining to employ any and all the educational facilities that our Government and any of the agencies of our civilization have at hand or can employ. It appears, according to the figures and the facts, indisputable and undisputed, that there are within the State of Montana to-night 1,073 Indian children who must be driven out upon the prairie, educated by charity or under the agency of the Government or under its contract for the ensuing year. There is no pretense that the United States can give them any school facilities. What is to become of them? Is it aiding a church to employ its schoolhouses any more than it is aiding a church to employ a dredge owned by a Methodist or to employ a shovel owned by a Baptist in executing a contract on a canal?

Mr. President, these Indian children rely wholly and solely and absolutely upon the Congress of the United States for some provision for their education. Must we educate them according to certain lines, employ given people, and exclude other people from employment, or else let the trust go undischarged? I do hope that in every Government school in the country some feature of the Christian religion is inculcated into those Indian children.

It has been my good fortune to visit many Indian schools, and I have observed in the exercises of the day the reading of texts from the Bible. It has not occurred to anybody to inquire whether it was the King James version or any other version of the Scriptures; it has been the reading of the Bible. Songs approved by Christian denominations are sung by those Indian children in the Government schools. Who would require that the singing of a hymn approved by any Christian denomination should be discontinued? Yet, carried to its logical consequences, the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts would require that the reading of the King James version of the Bible and the singing of hymns approved by any Christian man or denomination should be discontinued, lest perchance we might deal in sectarianism in teaching the North American Indian.

It is probably better—I have no doubt that it is desirable—that these Indian children on their way to a point, which I hope they will ultimately reach, to the enjoyment of American citizenship, shall be taught in Government rather than in sectarian schools; but I say that if the Government school is not available, the sectarian school or any other school should be employed rather than that these children should be driven out upon the open plain and deprived of all Christian example or education of any kind. It does not seem to me to be a debatable question.

Mr. President, there are no bigots in this Chamber. I do not believe there are any bigots in the American Congress. It is useless to argue with bigots. Some man has properly described a bigot as like unto the pupil of the eye—the more light you give, the greater the contraction. So, with a bigot, speech is useless, debate is without purpose, and consequently unnecessary and entirely without point.

What I desire is, coming down to the geographical point, that the 1,073 children of Indian blood in the State of Montana shall not be deprived of any education for the coming year, inasmuch as the Government can not supply them with the facilities in the schools now in existence or in prospect for this coming year. It does not seem to me fair. It does not seem to me just.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Montana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. If this new policy of nonsectarianism is to govern us in the matter of elevating and educating and civilizing and Christianizing those races with whom we have to deal, what is going to become of the Filipinos when we begin over there? There is no religion at all in those islands except the Catholic. Will we not be bankrupted if we have to send sectarian teachers there to run those ten or twelve million people? I believe the Senate ought to be a little consistent on this matter and deal with this problem in a practical way and look a little ahead. I see a very big ditch that somebody is going to tumble into presently.

Mr. THURSTON. I had hoped that we would not tack the Philippine question onto the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not tacking it onto the bill at all. It is relevant. Certainly it is not altogether out of the way just to mention the subject of Christianizing somebody somewhere. The Senator is appealing very eloquently to us to help continue the little teaching that these Indians are getting, and I see way down the road yonder, you know, several million Philippine children, who have to be taught by the Catholics, or we are going to spend a deal of money in sending people over there to give them either no religion or some other religion than the Catholic.

Mr. CARTER. I hope the Philippines will develop their own system of education. I should feel somewhat discouraged if we were confronted to-night with the problem of providing American teachers for the Filipinos.

I am told there are over 60 different languages or dialects in the Philippine Archipelago. There are over 30 among the North American Indians. If within a century we have not been able to make any more progress than the Commissioner of Indian Affairs indicates in the education of the North American Indians, with only 30 dialects, I imagine that in the next century we would make very trifling progress with the Filipinos with some 60 different dialects. The question is too large for discussion between now and the hour of adjournment, and I must implore the Senator from South Carolina to eliminate it from the present debate.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me, I had no purpose in the world except to indicate that I agree with him that as a practical proposition we had better let the Catholics teach these people than have nobody teach them; and if we can get any kind of a Christian idea into their heads, it does not matter whether it is Catholic or Methodist or Baptist or anything else, it is better than to leave them as they are.

Mr. CARTER. I agree fully with the Senator from South Carolina. This is not a question of any particular religion. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas does not relate to nor can it be properly chargeable with a purpose to advance education through any creed. The purpose of the Senator from Arkansas is to empower the Secretary of the Interior to provide educational facilities for those children for whom the Government schools can not provide.

It is suggested by others that the Government can provide the facilities. Well and good. If that be true, the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will never become operative, because it only provides for a contingency which the Senator from Massachusetts suggested can never possibly occur. But if, perchance, after the Government facilities have been entirely exhausted, 100 children shall remain unprovided with any kind of educational advantage, is it not fair and just and proper and right that the Secretary of the Interior should contract with somebody somewhere to give these children educational advantages for the coming year?

The amendment does not provide that a single child shall be sent to any school; it does not require the expenditure of a single dollar of public money; but it does provide that when the Government schools shall have been entirely filled, when a condition is reached when not another child can find entrance at the schoolhouse door, when all the arrangements of the Federal Government for the education of these children have been exhausted, then, and not till then, the agent of the Government, the Secretary of the Interior, may make a contract to provide an education for the poor struggling child who remains outside of the door and can not be provided for unless the contract is made. Upon what theory can opposition to such a proposition be justified? I am at a loss to know.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. ELKINS. What is the amendment? Let it be stated.

Mr. TELLER. I offered it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior shall take such measures as he may consider necessary to provide educational facilities for all the Indian children now in Government and contract schools, and especially those who may be discharged from contract schools.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. THURSTON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. I do not see that he is present, and I will withhold my vote.

Mr. HANNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUARLES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. TURLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] who is not present. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER], and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BURROWS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY]. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. KENNEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 14, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—14.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum having voted, the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 9, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 7, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

WASHINGTON COUNTY RAILROAD COMPANY, MAINE.

Mr. ALLEN of Maine. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2679) declaring certain trestles of the Washington County Railroad Company to be lawful structures.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the trestle on the Eastport Branch of the Washington County Railroad, being the property of the Washington County Railroad Company, and running from the extreme point of land south of Pleasant Point, in the town of Perry, county of Washington and State of Maine, to the extreme northern end of Carlows Island, in the town of Eastport, in said county and State; and a certain other trestle, also the property of said railroad company, in the East Machias River, in said county of Washington and State of Maine, at the extreme end of said river, near the village of East Machias, in said county and State, be, and both of said trestles hereby are, declared to be lawful structures: Provided, That such modifications are made in their present position, condition, and elevation as the Secretary of War may order in the interests of navigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. We have had no opportunity to examine this bill, and it seems to be a measure of some importance. I think, therefore, we ought to have some explanation of its purpose.

Mr. ALLEN of Maine. Mr. Speaker, this railroad is built and in running order. The two bridges referred to in the bill are trestle bridges—one across a tidal channel separating Point Pleasant from Carlows Island, Maine; the other is placed on an embankment at a point in the bridge over the Machias River at East Machias, Me.

These bridges were built without authority of law—that is, they were not built under the supervision of the War Department upon a license first obtained. Suits were commenced against the corporation to compel the construction of suitable drawbridges in both trestles. By an arrangement between the court and the corporation, proceedings were suspended until action could be taken by Congress providing for Government supervision of these structures.

This bill was referred to the War Department, and the Secretary of War recommended that before the passage of the bill an amendment which he submitted should be made in it. The amendment was to the effect that before these structures are declared legal structures drawbridges be built through them. That was the arrangement between the corporation and the court—that drawbridges should be constructed so as to allow navigation whenever it was needed, these structures being in tide water. Upon the suggestion of the Secretary of War this proviso was added to the bill:

Provided, That such modifications are made in their present position, condition, and elevation as the Secretary of War may order in the interests of navigation.

With that amendment, the bill has been passed by the Senate and is unanimously reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And it has the approval of the Secretary of War?

Mr. ALLEN of Maine. The bill was submitted to him, and he approved it with the amendment which has been incorporated in the bill. In view of that amendment being made he makes no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Was the amendment added by the Senate, or is it an amendment of the House committee, and now pending here?

Mr. ALLEN of Maine. The amendment was made in the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And embodied in the Senate bill?

Mr. ALLEN of Maine. The amendment was adopted in the Senate, and this is the Senate bill with that amendment incorporated.

Mr. TALBERT. Allow me to ask whether the bill carries with it any appropriation?

Mr. ALLEN of Maine. None whatever.

Mr. TALBERT. None now or hereafter?

Mr. ALLEN of Maine. None now or hereafter.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN of Maine a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BUREAU OF AMERICAN ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution No. 23.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 8,000 copies of any matter furnished by the Director of the Bureau of American Ethnology relating to researches and discoveries connected with the study of the American aborigines, the same to be issued as bulletins uniform with the annual reports, 1,500 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,500 for distribution by the Bureau.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; and it was adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4001) authorizing the adjustment of rights of settlers on the Navajo Indian Reservation, Territory of Arizona, had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. STEWART, Mr. SHOUP, and Mr. MCLAURIN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

REPORT OF DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution No. 14.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be 6,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals for the calendar year 1898, bound in cloth and wrapped, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Resolved, That there also be printed 8,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint covering the operations of the mints and assay offices of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, to be bound in cloth and wrapped, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 2,000 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 for the use of the Director of the Mint.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution; and it was adopted.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Printing were read and agreed to:

Page 1, line 9, strike out "eight thousand" and insert "seven thousand five hundred."

Page 2, line 2, strike out "two thousand" and insert "one thousand five hundred."

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

REPORT ON CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS IN THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 12.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, by direction of the Committee on Printing, further asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 12.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,500 copies of the report transmitted by the Secretary of State of the commissioner for the United States on the International Prison Commission on "Crimes, misdemeanors, and penalties" in the United States; of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for distribution by the Department of State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing if he has a resolution for printing the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, and if so, what has become of that resolution, and what is the probable action upon it?

Mr. HEATWOLE. The resolution is before the committee, and has not yet been taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLICS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That this House view with deep interest the heroic struggle of the Republics of South Africa to maintain their existence, and hereby tender them our most profound sympathy in their unequal but gallant contest.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I think that resolution had better go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not understand the remark of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the resolution is referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not understand the gentleman to object to its present consideration.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that if the understanding about his bill, that an hour is to be occupied in its consideration, is carried out, it will encroach upon the special order, as the gentleman was not ready to call it up when the House assembled, unless unanimous consent is first had to postpone the special order until this matter which the gentleman calls up is disposed of.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I was ready to call it up, but in the absence of certain members on the other side who desired to speak, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] suggested that it would have to go over until next week.

PETRIFIED FOREST NATIONAL PARK, ARIZONA.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9634) to set apart certain lands in the Territory of Arizona as a public park, to be known as The Petrified Forest National Park.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby reserved from settlement, entry, sale, or other disposal, and set apart as a public reservation, all those certain tracts, pieces, or parcels of land lying and being situate in the Territory of Arizona and particularly described as follows:

Townships sixteen and seventeen north, ranges 23 and 24 east, Gila and Salt River meridian, Arizona.

SEC. 2. That said public park shall be known as The Petrified Forest National Park, and shall be under the exclusive control of the Secretary of the Interior, whose duty it shall be to prescribe such rules and regulations and establish such service as he may deem necessary for the care and management of the same. Such regulations shall provide specially for the preservation from injury or spoliation of the mineralized or fossilized formations or deposits, natural curiosities, and wonders within said park.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, in the exercise of his discretion, to rent or lease, under rules and regulations to be made by him, pieces or parcels of ground within said park for the erection of such buildings as may be required for the accommodation of visitors.

SEC. 4. That all funds arising from the privileges granted hereunder shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as a special fund, to be expended in the care of said park.

SEC. 5. That all persons who shall unlawfully intrude upon said park, or who shall, without permission, appropriate, injure, or destroy any of the mineralized or fossilized formations or deposits found therein, or other natural wonders or curiosities therein, or commit unauthorized waste in any form upon the lands or other public property therein, or who shall violate any of the rules and regulations prescribed hereunder, shall, upon conviction, be fined in a sum not less than $50 nor more than $5,000, or be imprisoned for a period of not less than fifteen days nor more than twelve months, or shall suffer both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I am always glad of an opportunity to do something by way of legislation for the benefit of the Territory of Arizona.

The gentleman representing that Territory [Mr. WILSON] has taken occasion to criticise the use of a few words of mine, uttered in the midst of debate, as an unjust reflection on his Territory. I was talking of Puerto Rico, an island with 110 inches of annual rainfall and with a population of 800 persons to the square mile, when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] suggested a comparison with Arizona, though Arizona has less than one inhabitant to the square mile and a very small annual rainfall.

I did not attempt to elaborate on the question and did not give any adequate idea of my personal views as to Arizona, but it was far from my thought to assail that Territory. The aridity of the country is well known and gives it the name of the "arid zone." But the very lack of rainfall that makes irrigation essential to successful agriculture has its compensation. The dryness of the air makes the climate an ideal one for the human lungs. It is the sanitarium of the world. Its lack of rainfall was what I had in view when I used the words which the gentleman used as the text for his discourse. If the speech made by him places him in a pleasing light before his constituents, its principal purpose will no doubt have been accomplished; but I regret that he should have so eagerly caught at a sentence of mine to place me in an attitude of apparent hostility to that Territory. I wish here and now to disclaim any such position.

In my service in the House, though serving on many committees, I have always been on the Committee on Public Lands, and have had many opportunities to show good will to that Territory and its people by giving unremitting attention to the various subjects of legislation in which they have been interested.

Many of her most enterprising and successful citizens I have known in my own State before they sought the healing air of Arizona. While Arizona has some of the best land in the world, it also has some of the worst, and the attempt to ignore that fact only lessens the value of the good testimony which the gentleman has given in his speech. But enough of this; I only want to say enough to disclaim anything but the friendliest feelings toward the people and the Territory in question. I hope and predict for her a great future.

Arizona has mineral deposits which are now being extensively worked, and which will no doubt produce very great wealth in time to come. The gentleman has missed some of the strong points of Arizona, and I trust he will not take offense if I supply them. She has many scenic advantages which are not adequately appreciated by the traveling public and which he has ignored. He has confined himself to her soil and mines alone.

The Grand Canyon of the Colorado will soon be accessible by rail, and its wonders will become one of the visiting shrines for all the lovers of beauty and grandeur of the earth. No one can destroy that great product of nature. The gentleman from Arizona has forgotten altogether, in his description of his Territory, its points of beauty. I hope he is not oblivious to such advantages.

The Grand Canyon of the Colorado and the sunny climate of Arizona can take care of themselves, but the Petrified Forest will be destroyed unless it is protected by law, and it is proposed by this bill to create a national park for the preservation of this wonderland for the enjoyment of posterity. The bill which is now before the House has been prepared for that purpose, and when enacted into law will add the Petrified Forest National Park of Arizona to the Yosemite, the Yellowstone, Rainier, and the other wonders of nature around which the Government of the United States has thrown her protecting mantle.

The United States Government tardily recognized the necessity of preserving as public property some of the great wonders of nature. The Yellowstone National Park was the first one of these reservations thus set apart as a pleasure ground for the nation. Since then the public lands around the Yosemite have been embraced in a national park. Efforts are being made to save the big trees of California from the saw of the lumberman. Mount Rainier has become a park and its natural scenery preserved from mutilation.

Arizona, with her pure, healing air, has for many years been the source of renewed life to the invalids of America. New Mexico and Arizona will in due time take the place of Nice and Mentone as the resort of the weak-lunged people of both hemispheres. Arizona has, in addition to the beauty of her climate, two of the most remarkable scenic wonders of the globe. The Grand Canyon of the Colorado is, without question, the most sublime and startling of all the works of nature in North America.

In talking with Hon. Mark Smith, of Arizona, about the Natural Bridge of Virginia, he said to me:

Sir, as compared with the Grand Canyon of the Colorado the Natural Bridge of Virginia is a playground for pismires.

But there is in Arizona a more wonderful scene than even the Grand Canyon itself. In a desert region, a few hours' journey by rail east of the Grand Canyon, is the Petrified Forest. In other parts of the United States there may be found petrifactions of remarkable character, but here are the remains of a great forest. These trees are of a coniferous, extinct species, with the exception of a single cottonwood trunk. They lie prone upon the ground as they drifted in on a prehistoric sea. Water-logged and heavy, they sank to the bottom, and were there covered with sand and changed into chalcedony. The sand hardened and cemented into stone and finally rose above the waters. This stone forest lay hidden from view for countless ages. By slow disintegration the embedding rock all washed away and the petrified trees, being much harder and more durable, were left lying scattered in dense profusion on the surface of the earth, where they had so long lain buried.

These trees are of the most beautiful colors, and the stone takes as high a polish as granite. Reckless tourists have long been engaged in carrying away fragments, even using dynamite on some of the finest specimens, and enterprising, money-making men have planned the removal and grinding of these trees into powder to be used as a substitute for emery, and the only thing that prevented this commercial vandalism was the discovery of a stone in Canada that would answer the same purpose, and the scheme was abandoned.

The legislature of Arizona favor the plan, and so does the Delegate from that Territory. No doubt the bill will become a law, and this remarkable product of nature's alchemy will remain as one of the wonders of the New World, and will become a shrine to be visited by the lovers of nature from every country under the sun.

I would like to call the attention of some of the gentlemen of this House who have had much to say about an English alliance to one thing connected with this proposed park.

The new railway station and post-office on the railway nearest the park is named after an old resident settler, Mr. Adam Hanna. The place is named Adamanna. The "H" has been dopped in the most English fashion from this name, and Adamanna is the result. I hope this evidence of British influence will prejudice no one against the park.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on the Public Lands, were read and agreed to:

Line 9, page 1, after "three," insert "and" and strike out "and twenty-five."

On page 2, lines 21 and 22, strike out "not less than $50 nor" and insert "of not."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FEDERAL COURTS, LOUISIANA.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 8963) to fix the terms of the district and circuit courts of the western judicial district in the State of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be held semiannually in the western judicial district in the State of Louisiana two stated sessions of the district and circuit courts at each of the following places, to wit: At Opelousas on the first Mondays of January and June; at Alexandria on the fourth Mondays of January and June; at Shreveport on the third Mondays of February and October; at Monroe on the first Mondays of April and October.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to ask if this bill has been reported by any committee of the House?

Mr. KERR. This bill has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary. It simply changes the time of holding a term of the circuit and district courts, which by existing law is fixed for the 30th of June, at Shreveport, La., and makes it an October term. The judges of the court, the bar, and all the people down there who are interested have represented to the committee that it was next to impossible to hold a term of court at Shreveport in July, and for that reason they recommended a change of the term to October.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KERR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS AS TO PUERTO RICO.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a privileged motion. On last Friday week, a week ago yesterday, I introduced a resolution of inquiry, addressed to the head of the War Department, which was properly referred, and has not been reported back within a week. The report is now privileged, and I ask for its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to furnish the House of Representatives with any opinion or opinions given the Department by Charles E. Magoon, law officer of the division of insular affairs, as to whether the Constitution was extended, ex proprio vigore, to the island of Puerto Rico when the peace convention between the United States and Spain was ratified; and in furnishing such opinion or opinions, if any were given, will also furnish such arguments or reasons as were assigned by said Magoon in support thereof.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion should be to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the consideration of the resolution——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move to discharge the committee and to adopt the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the consideration of the resolution just reported, and that it be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COLORADO COOPERATIVE COLONY.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6250) extending the time for proof and payment on lands claimed under the desert-land law of the United States by the members of the Colorado Cooperative Colony in southwestern Colorado.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for making final proof and payment for all lands located under the desert-land laws of the United States by members of the Colorado Cooperative Colony, of southwestern Colorado, shall be extended from time to time, yearly, for a period not exceeding five years from the time when proof and payment is due under existing laws, upon their filing with the register of the land office of the district in which such land is located affidavits of the secretary of said company, supported by two disinterested persons, showing that more than one-seventh of the necessary cost of building their canal for the reclamation of their lands, including laterals, has been done at the time of the application for said first extension; and like proof showing that a force of not less than ten men have been constantly at work on said canal or in preparing lumber, fluming material, etc., therefor, and have been continuously so at work since the last extension, shall entitle them to any subsequent extension herein provided for.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has not reported the amendments.

Mr. BELL. I wish to make a suggestion. The amendment only consists of giving the names of the cooperative colony and the numbers of their claims. There are 71 of them, and that is all there is to it. I move that we dispense with the reading of that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not wish the amendment reported?

Mr. PAYNE. I think certainly the House ought to hear the amendments.

Mr. BELL. Will the gentleman from New York hear me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the House has not yet given consent for the consideration of the bill. Let the Clerk report the amendments and complete his work.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after "Colony," in line 5, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Namely: No. 494, George Douglass, section 4, township 46 north, range 15 west; No. 438, Erskine Easton, section 5, township 46 north, range 15 west; No. 421, Ruth R. The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question about this bill. I understand that this is simply to extend the time and that the work is to be done as provided for under previous laws.

Mr. BELL. Yes; that is all.

Mr. PAYNE. And that it is reported from the Committee on Public Lands?

Mr. BELL. Reported unanimously.

Mr. LACEY. They have been unable to do the work during the time fixed by the original law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The work was very expensive, being a canal, costing probably $200,000.

Mr. PAYNE. How much have they done?

Mr. BELL. About $75,000 worth of work.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I introduced a resolution a few moments ago tendering our sympathy to the South African Republic, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] objected to it. I did not hear to what committee the resolution was referred.

The SPEAKER. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I ask unanimous consent that that committee have leave to report that resolution at any time.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Speaker, that does not intensify the matter for such a proceeding as this.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I hope there will be no objection made to leave being given them to report.

Mr. PAYNE. Making it a privileged report? I do not think there is any cause for altering the rules this morning. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the committee have leave to report that resolution at any time.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rose to a parliamentary inquiry and turns it into a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have the privilege——

Mr. GROSVENOR. I make the point of order——

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair state the request. (Continuing.) Have the privilege to report at any time on the resolution recently referred to that committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest that this go to the Committee on Rules. I think we ought to enforce the rule.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. RICHARDSON. All right.

TO EXTEND COAL-LAND LAWS TO THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5768) to extend the public-land laws to the district of Alaska.

Be it enacted, etc., That the public-land laws of the United States are hereby extended to the district of Alaska.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 3, after the word "that," insert the words "so much of;" and after the word "Alaska," in line 4, add the words "as relate to coal lands, namely, sections 2347 to 2352, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the title should be amended so as to read: "To extend the coal laws."

The SPEAKER. Does the report show what the amendment should be?

Mr. LACEY. I think not.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the title the word "public" and insert the word "coal;" so that it will read: "To extend the coal-land laws to the district of Alaska."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this correction of the title will be made.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported the bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that I will ask consideration of the bill on Monday at the earliest possible moment after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order on the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House take a recess until 1 o'clock.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CORLISS. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 34.

So the motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess.

AFTER THE RECESS.

The House resumed its session.

The SPEAKER. In pursuance of the order heretofore made, the House will now proceed to the consideration of the resolutions upon the life and character of the Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, of Missouri, late a member of this House.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended in order that suitable tribute may be paid to the high character and eminent public services of the Hon. RICHARD PARKS BLAND, late a most distinguished member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased the House, at the conclusion of these memorial exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased statesman, and inform the Senate of the action of this body.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, RICHARD PARKS BLAND was born in Kentucky, August 19, 1835, and died in Missouri, June 15, 1899. Between these lids, birth and death, are the leaves of a noble life.

BLAND reached manhood by the rough way which so many poor boys have trod. He passed a few years in the far West, among the pioneers who went to the wild mountains in search of the precious metals. In Missouri he married Virginia E. Mitchell, the devoted wife who bore him four sons and five daughters. The widow and six children survive to mourn the death of the best of husbands, the best of fathers. BLAND was a lawyer with a fair practice when he was elected to Congress. Believing that as the representative of the people he should quit his private business and devote himself wholly to the public service, he gave up the profession in which his progress had been satisfactory. Loving the country, he made his home upon a farm, and when wearied with the duties and cares of public life, there, communing with nature, he sought and found rest and recreation.

He served twelve terms, or twenty-four years, as a member of the House of Representatives of the United States, and death canceled his certificate of election for a thirteenth term. Once only was he beaten, and even then he barely missed election, although defeat overtook his party at almost every point. He was one of many vicarious atonements for the sins of others. Nominations came to him; no one else was thought of while he lived.

BLAND is most widely known through his prominent connection with the silver question. If his name were not woven for all time into the story of the free-silver conflict, as that of a master spirit there, he would have high place in the annals of other great issues under consideration during his long public career. For it is a fact that he had clear views upon every important principle involved in the measures passed or proposed in a quarter of a century of stirring times for the Republic and for mankind, and he was in the forefront of the battle as it raged around one after another of them.

This is not the time nor the occasion for a careful analysis of the views of the departed chieftain concerning the free coinage of gold and silver. He believed, without doubt or shadow of wavering, believed as he believed in the vital force of the cardinal virtues, the abiding prosperity of his countrymen, as well as the real advancement of the race along the lines of "the greatest good to the greatest number," to be dependent upon the free coinage of both gold and silver into standard money; and he was for "the old ratio." He believed that the world never had and never would have too much standard coin of these metals, but that, on the contrary, owing to a scarcity of such money, the great body of the people were and, without the remedy of free coinage, would continue to be at the mercy of the wealthy few.

Among the clouds of financial distress he could see no bow of promise of enduring prosperity for the masses, either in our own land or elsewhere, so long as primary money should continue to be so scarce that most of it, at any time and without notice or warning, could be withdrawn from the channels of trade, either by the cupidity or through the panicky fears of a few millionaires. He was deeply affected as he noted and vainly tried to avert the dangers which menaced the plain people, of whom he always was the faithful champion. He beheld the advance of science, discovery, and invention, but observed with a sad heart that the benefits which went to the many were grievously out of proportion to those reaped by the favored few. A poor man himself, battling for the poor, he saw how millionaires, like mushrooms, spring up in a night, while the sturdy yeomanry of the land go down in financial storms, as the grain in their fields falls under the stroke of the hurricane.

He was truly a lover of his fellow-man and a foe, stern and implacable, to whatever, viewed calmly and honestly, as he viewed all things, appeared to him to be destructive instead of promotive of the general welfare. To him it seemed monstrous that, by the legislation of the representatives of a free and noble people, dollars should be made scarcer in proportion to the need for them, when so many poor men have debts and taxes to pay and mortgages to lift. He never feared, as some have done and some others have claimed to do, that bad results would flow from increasing, by the free coinage of both silver and gold, the quantity of money in the United States and in the world. He could find neither force nor weight in the contention that the coinage of such money, as rapidly and as freely as the earth might yield the precious metals and man might choose to carry them to the mints, would disorganize business, or dangerously inflate prices, or stimulate men to wild speculation, or induce extravagance, or be productive, or even promotive, of any other of the ills which certain prophets (false prophets, he thought) said would result from free coinage.

He believed that, with primary money increasing in quantity as the energy and science of man might unlock, one after another, nature's storehouses, deep in the bowels of the earth or buried in the shifting sand, all property would advance in price and in salability; the burden of taxation and of debt would become lighter for the masses; industry would find fresh stimulus in increasing rewards; investments would yield larger and surer profits; money no longer would be hoarded as the safest and best way to make money through falling prices; and financial slavery—the most artfully contrived and cruelest of all the forms of bondage known upon the earth—would disappear steadily and rapidly, and soon be a thing of the past.

According to his philosophy, what the people need, and what of right they should have, is not merely enough money for good times, when every man who has money puts it into circulation either by using it himself or by lending it to others who will use it, but enough for hard times, when the scheming, the timid, and often the prudent, hold fast what money they have in hand, and draw in as quickly as possible what they have in business or at interest. He contended that when money is abundant, when supply keeps pace with demand, the many and not the few will have control of it; and that the courage and hope and enterprise of the many must always, and more especially in financial storms, afford a safer anchorage than the fright, the greed, and the manipulations of the few ever can supply.

But I did not mean to go far into the silver question, so close to the heart of the great American Commoner, and hence I leave it, with the fervent hope that the Ruler of nations and of men may raise up and sustain some champion of the people, as honest, as brave, as faithful, as steadfast, as the dead statesman whose loss we deplore, to take up his great fight and carry it on through the years, to complete victory.

In 1896, as the time drew near for the assembling of the national convention of the Democratic party, hope in the minds of many grew apace that BLAND would be the nominee for President. And when the convention met, and those of BLAND'S way of thinking were found to be in full control and firm in the assertion of their principles, nothing appeared more probable or fitting than that the honor of leading in the approaching contest between the parties should fall to him. But no persuasion could tempt him to strive for the nomination. His doctrine then, as always, was, THE CAUSE ABOVE THE MAN. For he had no disposition but to do good. The "cause" was dearer far to him than any prize that ambition could covet or fortune bestow.

So, while the clans were gathering at Chicago, while the platform was under discussion, when the balloting was going on, when Bryan was nominated—all the time, the unselfish patriot, the ardent lover of the "plain people," RICHARD PARKS BLAND, was at home on his Missouri farm, anxious for the "cause," but indifferent about himself, the man. The news that the nomination for the Presidency had been made, but that BLAND was not the nominee, smote more sorely than blows could have done the neighbors and friends who gathered about the smiling chieftain, exultant over the victory written in the platform. No sorrow, no bitterness, no disappointment touched the tranquil soul of the noble farmer-statesman, who had put and kept "the cause above the man." And as he sat there in the shade of the apple trees, every note of the wild bird in the branches, calling cheerily to its mate, was music sweeter far in his ears than all the triumphant blasts of bugles mingled with songs of victory from the throats of exultant friends over his nomination, ever could be. The "cause" had triumphed in the platform. What cared he, who was devoted to the cause and indifferent to self, whether it had been thought best to put him in the station of highest honor or in the ranks, so long as the lines were drawn true and he could be in the thick of the fight anyhow?

No doubt others will tell here and elsewhere—and the world knows—how BLAND was the vital force that brought into being the Bland-Allison Act. In principle and in policy that measure fell far short of BLAND'S judgment, wishes, and hopes; but he was not able to secure anything better. Who can tell how unbearable would have been and would be the burdens of his countrymen, or how complete would have been and would be the destruction of values in the small holdings of the poorer people, if the silver dollars coined under that law had never been made? The future, better than the past or the present, can estimate at their true worth the services of this devoted patriot to his countrymen and to mankind.

In forming a judgment of BLAND this thought of Emerson is suggestive:

Nothing is more simple than greatness; indeed, to be simple is to be great.

Who that believes with Emerson can doubt that BLAND was a great man? How simple he was! In him was no affectation. The real and not the seeming inspired him, moved him. On his farm in Missouri he was as plain as other farmers, and here in Washington, through all his great career, he was as plain as any self-respecting Missouri farmer might be. With him the man was to be regarded always, and not the clothes which the man wore, or the house in which he lived, or the wealth or the poverty with which he might be surrounded. No glitter could dazzle him; no temptation could swerve him from the right as it was revealed to him; no opposition could daunt him; no betrayal could shake his allegiance to truth and justice; no flattery could win him; no fire ever grew hot enough to drive him from his guns.

He never betrayed a trust, never deserted a friend, never took a mean advantage of an antagonist. So well poised was he that he discerned the right as if by intuition; so brave and devoted that he would have led a forlorn hope as coolly as he would turn a furrow in one of his fields, in preparation for the seedtime. If martyrdom could have secured the triumph of any great cause in which he was enlisted, he would not have quailed at sight of the stake. And none are more gentle than he was.

BLAND was all that the most exacting can find expressed in those words of deep and noble meaning: Husband, Father, Friend. He loved home and family and all that make both dear to every true man. There were none against whom he cherished enmity—and who could know him and live in hostility to him? A shaft piercing him, whether sped thoughtlessly or in malice, sank in the deep ocean of his charity, far out of sight of men, however sore the wound made by it might be. He never tried to hurt, but always to help. He fought hard, but in the lofty purposes of his warfare principles, and not men, engaged his attention.

Honor is the recompense of those who do right without seeking recompense.

Thus spake a wise man among the ancients. And if he spake truly, what chaplets of honors should garland the memory of our departed friend! Modest, simple, kindly, in all his works and ways; unselfish, generous, tender in all his relations in life; brave, steadfast, faithful, in all his undertakings—we are richer, my countrymen, in that RICHARD PARKS BLAND lived and worked for us, and poorer, far poorer, in that his labors are ended and he he has gone from us forever.

He died when the shadows from the west, though lengthened, showed that the sun still was above the horizon and the night of years had not yet fallen. He died before the weight of age was upon him, but some solace may be found in the reflection, harbored by many, that the best time to die is when one is in his prime, ere the powers of the mind have begun to wane or the springs of life have dried up. At least, it is a consolation to be able to remember our friend as he was—not bowed with age, not borne off the field wounded and writhing in pain, but keen-sighted, calm, and bold—the chieftain whose voice was clear and whose lance was sharp-pointed and well poised, suddenly summoned to quit, for a higher sphere of usefulness, the life which all, sooner or later, must lay down.

Friend of every true man, and foe to none; friend of many days, faithful always and ever generous—to whom, in all the annals of this historic old Hall, has tribute been paid with better right than thine? Who has been truer than thou? Who braver in the fight? Who more steadfast when temptation came and hosts opposed? Whose life was more simple, purer, nearer to the people, than thine? Whom did ambition blind less or duty control more? Who beyond thee put "the cause above the man?"

We shall not err in rating BLAND as a great man. The goodness which inspired him, the judgment which guided him, the courage which animated him, the faithfulness which characterized him—surely these and other elements of noblest quality were so blended in him as to make him great. A man may be good without being great, but no man can be great without being good. Intellect and learning men may have in abundance, they may be strangers to fear, and yet not be great; but when so many parts of greatness, in liberal proportion, are blended so happily as in the friend of whom we speak to-day, who will deny that he was of the company of the great?

Thousands traveled far to gather about BLAND'S bier and attend his body on the march to the grave. They came individually and in society organizations. Great men were there, with heads bowed and eyes moist. And the plain people, his Missouri neighbors—laboring men and farmers, mechanics, merchants, professional men—a multitude of them bent in grief over his coffin. Everyone realized that he had lost a dear friend. To each and all BLAND had been gentle and kind and "faithful unto death." They do not expect ever to meet his superior, and no price could buy their memory of him, so tender, so proud.

Truly, all that was mortal of BLAND sleeps well in the little churchyard near his old homestead in the great State of Missouri, whose people he loved and served long and faithfully, and the love of whose people for him and their reverence for his memory are as enduring as life.

And that lowly yet lofty spirit which so lately dwelt in that body of his, over which nature will spread her soft green carpet—where is it?

Hearken unto the words of the wise man of UZ, as they float across the centuries, with their boon of assurance and their balm of resignation:

> The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, it was my good fortune to know Mr. BLAND well and intimately; indeed, I may say that in a large degree I enjoyed his friendship and confidence, while I fully and freely gave him mine in return. My personal acquaintance with him began in the Forty-eighth Congress. Of his contemporaries then in the House of Representatives, there are now only fourteen who are members of this House, and they are Mr. BINGHAM of Pennsylvania, Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN of Iowa, Mr. HITT of Illinois, Mr. KETCHAM of New York, Mr. LANHAM of Texas, Mr. MULLER of New York, Mr. PAYNE of New York, Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee, Mr. RAY of New York, Mr. STEELE of Indiana, and Mr. WADSWORTH of New York.

Oh, how time and change and death have decimated the membership of that body, and how few of us there are who yet remain! As the circle becomes smaller and smaller, my sense of personal attachment to the survivors is intensified. There is a community of feeling and experience with us that does and ought to bind us more strongly to each other in friendly interest.

The passing of years, the decease and consequent diminution of friends and associates, the realization that we are gradually yet surely growing old, and without pause by the wayside, are approaching the end of the journey, the physical and mental mutations of which we are conscious and yet powerless to control, the thoughts and experiences that come to us when we know that the greater part of life's distance has been traveled, the retrospect, the knowledge that "primal strength and the rose of youth" can never be restored, the heart's yearning for "friends regretted, scenes forever dear"—all these and cognate reflections give rise to emotions which no language can portray.

They are never more aroused than when we stand in the presence of our beloved dead. It is then that our natures long and cry out for immortality. It is then when hope beyond the grave is most inspired, and trust in the promises of God affords the greatest solace. It is then when the "blessed tie that binds" us to friends still left, is the strongest, and fellowship and communion with them are most desired and appreciated.

I was assigned in that Congress to the committee of which Mr. BLAND was chairman, and it was my privilege to be closely associated with him in the consideration of those questions the investigation and advocacy of which rendered his public service notable. Our acquaintance ripened into the most pleasant and cordial relations, socially and politically. Unusual opportunity was afforded me to study him and to understand the manner of man he was, and accordingly I feel measurably qualified to say something of his life and character.

In paying tribute to his memory, it is my earnest desire to be entirely sincere and truthful. I shall not permit the promptings of affection nor the license of obituary to carry me beyond the limitations of good conscience and veracious estimate. Were he living, he would protest against any unwarranted or extravagant compliment. Adulation was always distasteful to him. Candid and conscientious himself, he respected frankness and truthfulness in others. He was singularly free from dissimulation, and eschewed all manner of insincerity. He was without pretense and without guile, and far above and beyond anything little or mean.

I have never known a cleaner and more thoroughly upright man in public life. He was indeed a model of integrity. He was essentially a man of the people, and his sympathies were always with them, and his efforts ever exerted in their behalf. He was justly termed the "Great Commoner." His tastes and habits were simple and unostentatious. He was a modest man. He was courageous and insistent wherever his convictions of duty led him, and his political associates experienced a sense of safety when following him. His action and example not infrequently influenced their votes and conduct.

In voting with Mr. BLAND they were not afraid of adverse criticism. They felt that he had the full confidence of the people, and that whatever he did would meet their approval.

Early in his Congressional career he applied himself to and focalized his research and energies upon what is known as the money question, and especially upon the subject of coinage. He studied them thoroughly and laboriously, and it is perhaps not too much to say that he was more conversant therewith than any American of his day. He was essentially the pioneer and ceaseless advocate of the remonetization of silver; always vigilant and resolute in his contention.

In this connection he achieved for himself a national reputation. He was known and quoted not only in the United States, but wherever monetary science was discussed in the civilized world. He made valuable contributions to the subject he understood so well, not only in the halls of legislation, but with his pen he reached thousands of reflecting minds through the great journals of his time.

While he was familiar with and participated in the discussion of all great issues which engaged attention during his public life, and was possessed of comprehensive judgment and ready grasp of all governmental problems and economic policies, his claim to enduring remembrance and historic perpetuation as a statesman, will rest substantially upon his philosophy and treatment of the money metals. That he was inspired in all he did by his own conscientious approval and the loftiest patriotism, all who knew him will cheerfully attest. His ability and earnestness challenged the admiration of those who believed with him and won the respect of those who disagreed with him.

His immediate constituency testified their approbation of his course and their great attachment to him by oft-repeated indorsements and reelections; and when the monetary policy which so conspicuously marked his Congressional career became the leading tenet of the national party to which he belonged, millions of his political friends and admirers favored his nomination for the Presidency. He lived to see "the stone which certain builders rejected become the head of the corner," and that proposition, to the success of which he had given his unremitting endeavor, and upon which he had bestowed the best years of his life, not only ratified and adopted by his party, but made the rallying cry which summoned its hosts to the polls.

Mr. BLAND was one of the most amiable men I ever knew. His kindliness of disposition and unobtrusive mannerism drew men toward him and made them feel easy in his presence. He was readily approachable, and the very soul of gentleness in his personal relations with all who knew him, and the better he was known the more highly he was esteemed. His private life was beautiful and his conduct irreproachable. There was a quiet, native dignity about him in his daily walk and conversation which gave a charm to his personality. He had a kind word for every one with whom he came in contact.

In public discussion he was earnest and forceful, positive and vigorous; and yet he was courteous and preserved the amenities of debate and the decorum of intellectual controversy. His denunciation of what he considered wrong was ever prompt and severe, and I have often seen him stern almost to indignation when combating what he believed to be vicious in policy, detrimental to the interests of the people and the cause of good government. He was vehement in protest and resented with all his might every species of injustice to his fellow-men.

No blot nor blur stained his lofty manhood. Purity of life, rectitude of conduct, rigid integrity, and unstinted devotion to principle adorned his long and illustrious career. Verily, he hath left behind him a good name and a record without blemish.

I knew much of his inner life. He cherished his home circle in a marked degree. A more loving, faithful husband, a kindlier, better father, a nobler, truer man, a more exemplary citizen, a more faithful and patriotic statesman never lived nor died.

Knowing him as I did and prepared as I am to speak truly of him, I wish to record of him what, after all, is the highest possible human tribute, the supreme "conclusion of the whole matter" of excellency in earthly conduct and nobility of character, the grandest epitaph that can mark the last resting place of any of our race, the very best that friend living can say of friend dead—"He was an honest man."

It is given to none of us to lift the veil which overhangs the portal of the unseen world. What happens after death and whither the spirit wings its flight, are beyond human discovery. The past we know, but the future we can not discern. We can only hope and trust in the infinite love and mercy and intercession of our great Redeemer, and that through these there cometh at last a safe deliverance.

While Mr. BLAND was not a member of any church, he nevertheless had the highest respect for the Christian religion and the greatest regard for those who were truly pious. I am persuaded that he fostered in his soul, as he practiced in his life, many of the real virtues and true principles of Christianity. He loved truth and abounded in charity toward all mankind. His ear was quick to the distress and afflictions of others and his hand and heart were always ready in their alleviation. I have no doubt that as he approached the "valley of the shadow," and realized that he must soon appear in the presence of his Maker, he had a ready audience with the Father of Spirits, and received assurance of that peace and rest which await the faithful.

Mr. Speaker, in his death I have lost one of the dearest and most valued friends I ever had—intimate and confidential, to whom I could talk and with whom I could confer with absolute freedom and perfect reliance upon any subject. His advice and judgment were always useful to me. It will ever be one of the sweet comforts of my life that he did me the honor to bestow upon me his personal regard, and the memory of my communion with him will always be precious.

When I received the message announcing his death and requesting my presence at his obsequies, it reached the depths of my heart and touched my nature beyond my power to describe. I responded to the summons. I looked upon his dear old honest face, cold in death. I visited his desolated home and viewed the scenes of his domestic life, and there came upon me a feeling of personal bereavement such as I think is rarely experienced by one not of kindred blood. It was to me a funeral of inexpressible sadness. Thousands of his friends and neighbors and constituents were there. Multitudes, representing every walk and condition of life, gathered to testify their respect and pay their final tribute.

The sympathy and sorrow not only of his district and State, but of the whole Union were manifest in the attendance upon the last sad rites and through what was said of him in the press. I imagine there has never been in Missouri, and perhaps never will hereafter be, a funeral which so affected the throbbing hearts of the great mass of the people. They knew and felt that they had lost a true and constant and mighty champion of their rights.

We laid him away to rest until the Resurrection, with every benediction on his memory, and felt that a great and good man had passed away. May the Almighty comfort and protect his widow, and may his children "be beloved for the father's sake."

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND was born in Ohio County, Ky., which is within the district I have the honor to represent in this House. It was there, under sunny skies, in a genial climate, and amongst a generous and chivalrous people, that he grew to young manhood's estate. It is an honor which I appreciate not a little to occupy in this House the seat which was occupied by Mr. BLAND in the Fifty-fifth Congress and to speak, as I do, for the district that gave birth to so conspicuous a figure in American politics.

So far as I have heard, Mr. BLAND sprang from a parentage that was humble in station and limited in fortune, though eminently reputable in name, upright in conduct, and rich in those attributes that make a human character beautiful and attractive. I had not the pleasure and profit of a personal acquaintance with Mr. BLAND until the Fifty-fifth Congress was convened in extraordinary session in March, 1897, but from our introduction until the close of his faithful career upon this earth our relations steadily grew more cordial, and the sentiment of respect that I had long entertained for him intensified and developed into the higher, better, and more enduring emotion of genuine friendship.

Oftentimes we met here when the House was not in session, and indulged in pleasant converse about his childhood's happy days in the old Kentucky home. He never grew tired of telling nor I of listening to his recollections of Ohio County and its people, and many were the inquiries that he made about the friends of his early days, many of whom had long before him crossed the dark and mystic stream into the country whose pleasures and delights are of hope and faith rather than of knowledge to us, but some of whom still linger upon time's wasting shores mourning his death, revering his memory, and praising his noble deeds.

All the engaging vicissitudes of his active and busy life had not obscured his recollections of or abated his genuine affection for his native county and the people of his youthful years. The people of Ohio County, as well as of all Kentucky, cherished and loved him as one of its favorite sons, and he loved them as well. He was plain and unpretentious, but his power and ability did not need to be regaled in the transient habiliments of self-conceit. I hazard nothing in saying that he possessed all the qualities of mind and heart that go to make a man really and truly great to an eminent and in such proportion that there were but few men indeed who could measure to his standard.

He came, as I have intimated, from a people who loved the right and spurned the wrong, and throughout his public and private life he prized this as his highest and most valuable heritage, and was always faithful to this traditional principle of his family and his people.

He was indeed a great commoner in this, that he guarded with unrivaled vigilance and fidelity and with marked zeal and intelligence the rights of the great masses in their conflicts with the special interests. He was among the first to urge the restoration of silver as a standard money, and in the hours of our fiercest struggle on this great question, when those who had long been his party associates and to whom he was bound by ties of personal friendship were some of them faltering and others fleeing, he stood true to the cause of the people, unmoved by the persuasion of his friends and undaunted by the taunts of his foes.

He was the truest, best type representative of the plain people I have ever known. He was not a tactician nor, in the general acceptance of the term, a politician, but rather was he a patriot and a statesman. He was as honest in his conviction, as courageous in his action, as correct in his judgment upon economical questions and public affairs as he was pure, gentle, and lovable in his private life and character. His splendid record is a part of and inseparable from the history of our common country. But he has gone from us.

No more will he be seen in the walks of men; but the lofty influence that went out from him, and that will continue to live after him, will touch and elevate our national character, and mark with indelible impression our national policies, while his wise counsel when on earth will be as a "lamp unto our feet and a light unto our path." Human eye hath not seen the land to which he has gone; but for the eternal abiding place of one so pure, so good, and so great as our departed friend, we can not doubt that it is all that has been told us through sacred song and story, and that he now enjoys "the peace that passeth all understanding."

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, this day has been set apart to enable us to pay proper tribute to the high character and distinguished public services of the late Mr. BLAND of Missouri, who departed this life at his home, Lebanon, on the 15th day of June, 1899.

On occasions like this all party feelings that usually divide us in this Chamber are laid aside. There are no controversies, and there is no dissension here to-day. Before the uplifted finger of death we who survive him stand in reverential awe. The river of life and death flows between us and him. He can not come to to us, but we can go over to him.

Mr. BLAND was born at Hartford, Ky., on the 19th day of August, A. D. 1835, of poor but honest parentage. At an early age he commenced life for himself with no resources except a strong mind, good health, an indomitable will, and a firm conviction "that without honesty no other excellence, religious or moral, is worth anything."

The battle of life with him was not an easy one. The prospect at the beginning was not bright, but to his courageous soul there was no such word as fail. To succeed it was necessary for him to meet and grapple with those dread jailers of the human heart—poverty and humble birth. He subdued both, and slowly but surely moved toward the front, modestly but grandly holding every advance he made in individual growth and personal worth until he became an idolized leader of the Democracy, not only in the House of Representatives but in every section of our beloved country. His party never made a mistake in following his lead.

In his elevation to the responsible position of a Representative in Congress from the capital district of Missouri, he never lost sight of the farmers and laboring people from whose ranks he came, but always remembered the ties of affection that bound him to them. He had confidence in the judgment and patriotism of the people.

He was a true friend and champion of the helpless and oppressed, wherever found. He was the enemy of all special privileges and believed in absolute equality in legislation.

For the many hard blows he struck for the bleeding, bankrupt, broken-hearted people of the South we will always cherish his memory.

Power had no enticement or terror for him, and with his sense of duty as his only guide, his voice and vote were always on the side of right as he saw it, without any thought of how it might be viewed by those who ruled for the time being. He resisted and resented as vigorously the suggestions of the President elected by his own party that silver coinage should be suspended as he did the passage of the Sherman law by a Republican Congress.

To him more than any other one individual is due the credit for the standard silver dollars now in circulation. He believed in the free and unlimited coinage of both of the money metals, but did not believe in irredeemable paper money. While he at the same time resisted the single gold standard and fiat paper money, he insisted that gold and silver should be coined upon equal terms and that all paper money should be issued by the Government and convertible into such coin on demand. He did not think it possible to have too much real money.

He spent twenty-four years at this capital, where many of our ablest and most brilliant men are wrecked and ruined by yielding to the temptations that meet public men at every turn, but no breath of suspicion ever stained his character or assailed his honor.

Whether at home as a private citizen or here as a Representative in Congress he was always the same sober, upright, honest, pure, clean, brave, good man. Such a person can not pass from the living without being missed. He will be missed in this Chamber. He will be missed in Missouri. He will be missed by the country at large. He will be missed more by his beloved ones at home than anywhere else. The death of such a man in the midst of important and unfinished labors seems to us poor mortals strange; but as Christians, believing in the same Divine Ruler in which he so confidently trusted, we should not question either the mercy or wisdom of the sad bereavement that took him from us.

It is not our privilege to understand the mysteries of life and death. The only light and hope we can get is from the revelation given in the great book of books. For a man like Mr. BLAND, whose entire life was one of honest purpose and noble deeds, we should not grieve, but rather believe that his labors on earth were finished and that the Master called him to his eternal reward. God bless his memory! May He who overrules all events for His own glory comfort and sustain his widow and children. May we, standing as it were around his fresh-made grave, resolve to imitate his virtues and to renew our faith in and hope of a blessed immortality.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, at the organization of the Forty-third Congress, in December, 1873, I made the acquaintance of RICHARD PARKS BLAND, of Missouri. That was the beginning of my service in the National House of Representatives and also the beginning of his. Both of us were young men. With the exception of two years, each of us had continuous service in the House of Representatives from that time until the death of Mr. BLAND, on June 15, 1899.

At the time of his decease there were only three members of the House who had had service in the Forty-third Congress—Mr. BLAND, Mr. Harmer, and myself.

Early in our service in the House Mr. BLAND and myself became well acquainted and close personal friends, and our friendship was cemented with the years and remained unbroken to the time of his death.

His service covered a very important period in the history of the Republic. Many questions involving reconstruction arising from the civil war, financial questions, economic and industrial questions of great importance to all the people, were considered from time to time in Congress, and their consideration ripened into legislation. In many instances I was not in harmony with Mr. BLAND in those matters of legislation; but it affords me real pleasure to declare that even when his views and policies were diametrically opposed to those of my own party, I never for a moment doubted his sterling uprightness, his perfect sincerity, and his single-heartedness. In all his long service in Congress there never was a day or an hour when he did not give his best efforts to the promotion of just and proper legislation according to his best judgment.

He was industrious, intelligent, sagacious, forceful, and incorruptible; simple and unaffected; sturdy and indomitable in parliamentary battle; always actuated by a high sense of duty and loyally devoted to its dictates; withal carrying with him, under a seemingly rugged exterior, that sweet tenderness of heart which always goes with true manliness; constant and faithful to the public interests, at all times commanding the respect of his colleagues on both sides of the House and of those who did not agree with him in politics, as well as those who were his party friends, throughout the whole country.

I will leave it to others to speak more fully of his public achievements and of his personal relations at his home and in the district and State from which he came. In closing let me say simply his reputation in the public service is a precious heritage for his family and friends and an incentive to devotion to the public service for those who shall succeed him. And the Republic will be indeed fortunate if all her sons in the future will bring to her service a patriotism as pure and a devotion as earnest as RICHARD PARKS BLAND brought with him when he entered the National House of Representatives and carried with him continuously to the end.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, RICHARD PARKS BLAND was a unique figure in American politics. The history of the Republic can not be written adequately or intelligibly without assigning a high place and large space to this unpretentious Missouri farmer. Wherever money circulates or civilization abounds his name is familiar to the ears of men, and is spoken reverently to-day by millions who never looked upon his rugged face and to whose language he was an utter stranger. He belonged to that very small group of American statesmen who achieved imperishable renown without reaching the Presidency. You can count them on the fingers of your two hands without counting twice; but whoever else may be excluded from that goodly company by the inexorable test of time, BLAND will stand there immortal.

What was the secret of this man's wondrous hold upon the affections of mankind? Not dazzling genius, for he had none. Not soul-stirring eloquence, for he was no orator. Not personal magnetism, for he was destitute of it. Not courtly manners, for his were brusque. Not great and varied learning, for his reading was not wide and his investigations were limited to economic subjects. Not scintillating wit, for his was a serious mind. Not the cunning of demagogues, for he was artless as a little child. Not great wealth, for he was poor in this world's goods and had no desire for riches. Not the glamour of military success, for though a brave Indian fighter on the Western frontier, he never spoke about that feature of his life without being asked and then with blushing modesty. Not a commanding presence, for though his face was strong, he would never have been selected as a leader of men by his flesh marks alone.

In fact, he possessed few, if any, of the characteristics which are usually deemed necessary to a great political career; nevertheless, it is not too much to say that he was one of the most potent factors in the politics of our age; his influence girdled the globe and favorably affected the prosperity and happiness of dwellers upon the banks of the Ganges and the Nile as well as the denizens of the Mississippi Valley. When all the timeservers, double dealers, and self-seeking wire-pullers of this century molder in forgotten graves, the unsullied life, the amazing self-abnegation, the lofty patriotism, the benignant philanthropy of "Silver Dick" BLAND will be discussed and applauded by the historian of the times in which we live.

Young men ambitious of political preferment and of a noble and enduring fame will do well to pass lightly by the shrewd manipulators and aspiring mountebanks and to study profoundly the far-reaching results of BLAND'S career. They will discover that his commanding position was due to his intense devotion to principle, to his absorbing love of truth, to his integrity of mind, and to his leonine courage. He stood for conscience in politics and for impartial justice and equal right to all God's children. Without arrogance of character, he possessed an independence of soul which would not have flattered Neptune for his trident or Jove for his power to thunder. He was what Marc Antony described himself to be, but which Marc most emphatically was not—"a plain, blunt man, who loved his friends"—and he died amid the lamentations of the plain people, of whom he was the best type.

BLAND was not only honest, but he avoided the very appearance of evil—a thing to be commended in a public man. For example, when his admirers in Colorado presented him with a rich, magnificent silver service for his table as a testimonial of their appreciation of his great fight for silver, with a delicacy rare among statesmen, he declined the splendid gift with thanks, being unwilling that the great cause for which he stood and which he had so much at heart should be smirched by even the suspicion of a mercenary motive on his part. The sight of that costly and artistic service was enough to make a man's mouth water, but I have not even the shadow of a doubt that BLAND would have declined the gift had it been another Comstock lode.

When, however, the silver wedding of the BLANDS came round, and his Missouri colleagues in the House and Senate presented them with a handsome silver souvenir of their affection, he cheerfully, promptly, and, I think, proudly accepted that, for not even malice itself could suggest a sordid motive in either the giving or acceptance, Republicans joining heartily with Democrats in making the gift.

BLAND was direct in his methods. What he did he did boldly and aboveboard. He absolutely refused to stoop to conquer, and looked with amazement and contempt upon those who crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning. No matter who ran up Gessler's cap in the market place, this stalwart Missourian refused to worship and resolutely kept his beaver on his head. Others might temporize and do expedient things. He would not. He kept his honor bright as the spear of Achilles or the plowshare of Cincinnatus.

He participated frequently in debate. His style was plain, terse, luminous. He could hit and hit hard. He quoted no anecdotes; he never drew on the poets; he essayed no flights of eloquence; he used few historical illustrations; but in simple language he went at once to the heart of his subject, always commanded both the attention and respect of the House, and came to be a force in the affairs of men with which statesmen of all parties were compelled to reckon.

Though his public speeches contain no suggestion of humor, in private conversation with those he liked he was free, open, communicative, both telling an anecdote well and enjoying the fun as much as any.

He was too confiding and was easily imposed upon by designing knaves, if they came to him in the sacred name of friendship or of political kinship; but once convince him of a man's duplicity or meanness and he shut his great, tender heart against him resolutely, mercilessly, and forever. Under provocation he could use language as harsh and vigorous as any man I ever knew, but those occasions were few and far between.

Socially he was a bashful man, a most lovable man. It was a pleasure to accept the hospitality of the Blands in their comfortable Washington home, where content, mutual trust, and loving kindness did abound. A fonder husband, a tenderer father never lived, and he had his ample reward in the unstinted love of his wife and children. That family exerted a sweet, a wholesome, a benign, an elevating influence over all with whom they came in contact.

Of BLAND it may be said, as Thomas Jefferson said of James Monroe:

He was so pure that if his soul were turned inside out you would not find a blot upon it.

I have said that BLAND was not an orator; but in the days to come his speeches will be analyzed and studied as the mainspring for a great political revolution.

If BLAND ever took any thought of his fame, which I am persuaded he did not, he would have chosen to rest his reputation as a parliamentary speaker upon the great speech popularly known as "The parting of the ways speech," delivered in August, 1893, on "The repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law." It was an epoch maker and rendered possible the Chicago platform of 1896 and the astounding campaign which Bryan made upon it. In effect, it was like Patrick Henry's great lyric speech before the Virginia house of burgesses, which precipitated the Revolution and which still stirs the heart like strains of martial music. That day BLAND faced a hostile audience and defied the mighty power of an unfriendly Administration with a serene courage, a directness of utterance, a demonstration of candor that forced round after round of applause from his most steadfast opponents. When, with a face glowing with intensity of feeling and with a lion's roar, he exclaimed, "We have come to the parting of the ways," all men knew that it was war, bitter war, among Democrats until BLAND'S principles became his party's creed. He secured only 101 votes in the House, but he had set in motion forces which have triumphed in the party, and which, under God, will triumph in the country and throughout the world.

I have often regretted that the portrait of the grand old man could not have been placed on immortal canvas by a master hand as he appeared that day—the greatest of his life—a day big with the fate of Cato and of Rome. Such a picture would deserve to rank with the greatest historical paintings of the world.

From that day to this I have loved and reverenced the man, and I will love and revere his memory always.

Though intimately associated with Mr. BLAND, I never heard him mention that speech. From that and other facts I am inclined to believe that he never had any adequate conception of what a colossal historic personage he was, and greatly underrated the immense influence which he had exerted upon the destinies of his country and his kind.

If he had understood anything about political management, he would have reached the White House, the ne plus ultra, the ultima thule, of human ambition. He was in every way worthy of that exalted station.

It was, however, persistently asserted in certain quarters that BLAND was not big enough to be President. That was a monumental mistake. Any man who can serve in Congress twenty-five years, hoe as big a row as BLAND did, and grow all the time, is big enough for any position whatsoever.

I have read and studied and thought somewhat about American Presidents, have seen five of them, and have endeavored with unbiased mind and unprejudiced heart to fairly estimate their mental strength, their moral worth, their educational equipment, and their services to mankind, also to ascertain the causes of their eminence; and my settled conviction is that if BLAND was not as great as Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, or Lincoln, the fact remains that we will be without a President most of the time if we never elect any man who fails to measure up to the lofty standard of that illustrious quartette.

As a scholar BLAND did not rank with Thomas Jefferson, John Quincy Adams, and James A. Garfield—the three most thorough Presidential scholars.

He was not a great captain, as was Washington, Jackson, Taylor, and Grant. He was not as much of a Chesterfield as Pierce or Arthur. As a manipulator he was not comparable with Martin Van Buren. But in common sense, which, after all, is the best sense, he had no superior among our Chief Magistrates. In brains he was above many of them; in length and conspicuousness of public service he overtopped most of them.

He had more reputation than any man ever nominated a first time for the Presidency except Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Taylor, and Grant.

BLAND was a modest man. He was very much disposed to hide his light under a bushel. He did right because he loved the right, and left the consequences to take care of themselves. He never seriously thought of being President until the people forced him to become a candidate. In 1894, when I nominated him for the Presidency in every speech I made, he regarded me as an unruly boy who loved him with more zeal than discretion. What St. Paul said of charity would apply to BLAND:

Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; vaunteth not herself; is not puffed up; seeketh not her own.

He came near being the hero of the McKinley bill debate by a strategic movement worthy of the genius of Napoleon. Not one person in ten thousand remembers that; but it is the plain, unvarnished truth nevertheless. Though BLAND almost succeeded in snatching victory from the jaws of defeat on that memorable occasion, he is still sometimes denominated a man of one idea.

If he had been elected President he would have restored the Government to the simplicity of the fathers, a consummation devoutly to be wished. He would have recalled the truly Democratic days when Jefferson rode to the Capitol, hitched his horse to a sapling, walked in among the bequeued and bepowdered magnates of the land and was sworn in as President; the days when Old Hickory smoked his corncob pipe in the White House; the days when Lincoln told anecdotes to relieve his wearied heart from its overwhelming burdens.

It would have been worth a pilgrimage across the continent to see "the Sage of Lebanon" quietly chewing his quid of "long green" in the Presidential mansion, dressed in plain, comfortable clothing, such as is generally worn by substantial Missouri farmers, and dandling his sweet little Virginia upon his knee. But it was not to be. BLAND was the Moses of the Free Silver hosts. The great Nebraskan is their Joshua. History repeating itself, BLAND was permitted to look into, but not to enter the promised land. There can nowhere be found one scintilla of evidence that he ever regretted the result of the Chicago convention. What he sought with a singleness of mind rarely equaled, with a fortitude never excelled, with a disinterestedness that challenged admiration, was not personal aggrandizement, but the triumph of a cause. Having seen his pet idea made the paramount principle in his party's platform, he was content. I have no doubt that the defeat of Bryan and that platform in November, 1896, had much to do with BLAND'S declining health, for he had passed the halcyon and exuberant period of youth, when "hope springs eternal in the human breast."

As a crowning mercy of Almighty God, he breathed his last not in a city's glare, amid the clang and clatter of contending factions, but in the grateful quietude of his country home; in the bosom of his family, surrounded by the brave, loyal, incorruptible mountaineers, who for a quarter of a century had stood by and supported him with unwavering courage, ineffable pride, unstinted confidence, and unfailing love.

I regard it as a blessed privilege to have known this man and to have been counted among his friends. I humbly and fervently thank God for such a noble and unselfish life, for I say, with Owen Meredith, that—

No life
Can be pure in its purpose and strong in its strife
And all life not made purer and stronger thereby.

His career is one of the priceless treasures of the Republic.

And indeed he seemed to me
Scarce other than my own ideal knight,
"Whose glory was redressing human wrong;
Who spake no slander, no, nor listen'd to it;"
* * * * *
The shadow of his loss moved like eclipse,
Darkening the world. We have lost him: he is gone;
We know him now: all narrow jealousies
Are silent, and we see him as he moved,
How modest, all-accomplished, wise,
With what sublime repression of himself,
And in what limits, and how tenderly;
Not making his high place the lawless perch
Of winged ambitions, nor a vantage-ground
For pleasure; but thro' all this tract of years
Wearing the white flower of a blameless life.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I come to offer my affectionate tribute to the life and character of RICHARD PARKS BLAND. My acquaintance with him, like that of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], began in the Forty-eighth Congress. I had long known him from reputation, but had never met him until the first session of that Congress. In the course of my service with him it also fell to my lot to be associated with him on the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Nothing conduces more to a thorough acquaintance and mutual knowledge of each other among members of Congress than service on the same committee, and the more important the questions considered the better is the understanding they have and the closer are their relations with each other.

No word of commendation of the good man of whom we speak to-day can fail to elicit my cordial approbation, for all that has been said of him is richly deserved.

Mr. Speaker, it is but usual and natural to speak well of the dead, and surviving friends are wont to vie with each other in recounting the virtues of the departed. Such tributes, when sincerely made, are entirely proper. It is true that they can not benefit the dead.

Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
Or flatt'ry soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

But we feel that it is a duty we owe to those who have gone upon the returnless bourn to bear truthful testimony to their merits; to perpetuate as far as may be done their good names and worthy deeds; to show to the living the esteem in which they were held, their loved ones the attachment we had for them, and to encourage others to emulate their virtues.

In all my intimate association with Mr. BLAND I constantly discovered new attractions in his character. He was thoroughly earnest in all he did and displayed a readiness to grapple with political and legislative problems as they arose which I have never seen surpassed. He seemed to have an instinctive perception of the merits of a proposition, and he was quick to detect a fallacy wherever it existed. When his mind was once made up, it was impossible to swerve him from that course which his sense of duty indicated.

He was a most conspicuous and striking figure in the House of Representatives for many years. But few men have made a more lasting impression upon its political history. Perhaps no man ever served here who has been more generally missed.

Great reputations are usually made by statesmen along special lines and upon some particular subject, to which they devote absorbing attention. It was so with Mr. BLAND. His name and fame are peculiarly connected with bimetallism and especially with the coinage of silver. This was an issue of unusual interest during the greater portion of his public service and ultimately became the chief contention of the political party of which he was a member. His persistent agitation and advocacy of the free coinage of silver contributed to a very large degree—more so, perhaps, than that of any American statesman—to give it the prominence it attained in party councils and popular consideration. His efforts in this direction marked him as an extraordinary man. He was a profound thinker and a close student and sought to thoroughly understand governmental problems. His speeches were always interesting upon whatever subject he spoke, but were especially so upon the subject of the money metals. This was essentially his public life work. He will live in history as perhaps the foremost bimetallist of his time.

I knew Mr. BLAND well, and was more frequently thrown with him in political and social intercourse than with any Representative in Congress during our service together. I think I understood his nature and disposition. Aside from his capacity as a statesman, I discovered in him many of the most admirable traits. His genial, pleasant, simple, and honest ways made him a most charming companion. He was one of whom everyone who knew him thought well. He had no enemies. I never heard a word in detraction of him, but everything in his praise.

Not only his family and friends and party, but the country at large has sustained an irreparable loss in his death. We "shall not look upon his like again." Why he should have been taken from us we can not understand. The purposes of Providence are inscrutable to finite minds, but our Christian philosophy teaches us to believe that the Maker "doeth all things well." Let us indulge the hope that death was to him "the gate to endless joy," and while cherishing his memory, let us strive to profit by his example, and so live that when we, too, shall be summoned to the great beyond it can be truthfully said of each one of us, as we all can declare of him, "He was a true and good and noble man."

[Mr. JONES of Virginia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I can not permit these solemn ceremonies to close without paying my humble tribute of respect to the memory of one so dearly loved and so much admired. In justice to my own pleasant relations with Mr. BLAND and in response to the high regard in which he was so universally held by the people of my district and State, I can not refrain from recording on this sad occasion my own personal sorrow and that of the people I have the honor to represent.

While I had known him for many years by reputation, my personal acquaintance with Mr. BLAND began in the Fifty-first Congress, when I was assigned with him to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. I had the honor of serving with him on that committee in the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses. During that time some very important measures came before the committee for its consideration; and in all the discussions before the committee and in the House Mr. BLAND always exhibited a very careful and exhaustive study of the coinage question.

He was a firm believer in the free coinage of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, and for many years earnestly devoted his great ability and energy toward the accomplishment of that purpose; and the great volume of silver dollars with their paper representatives, now enjoyed by the people, were largely the result of Mr. BLAND'S persistent labors. It should be said, however, in his justification, that he never approved the act under which they were coined as a sound measure or a correct solution of the coinage question. He simply accepted it as the best he could get under the conditions then existing.

Mr. BLAND'S real contention always was that silver should be treated as a money metal and not as a mere commodity measured by gold. Without casting any reflection upon other champions of the silver cause, I believe I can justly say that Mr. BLAND enjoyed the supreme distinction of having done more than any other American to keep this question prominently before Congress and the country for the last twenty years. It was the cause in which his hardest battles were fought and his fewest victories won. It was his long and faithful struggle for the people's money that made the illustrious name of "SILVER DICK BLAND" a household word in every corner of the Republic. And however much his opponents may have doubted the correctness of his conclusions, they never at any time questioned the purity of his purpose.

While the coinage question was the issue nearest to Mr. BLAND'S heart, and certainly the one upon whose correct solution he believed the prosperity and happiness of the people so much depended, it is a great mistake to suppose that he devoted all of his ability and study to that question alone. The records of Congress will convince every reader that but few, if any, important questions ever engaged the attention of this body during his long service here which Mr. BLAND had not carefully studied and thoroughly mastered. He was equally at home in discussing the tariff question, the trust question, the Constitution, the rules of the House, or any other important question affecting the rights of the people.

While he made no pretentions to oratory, yet he was clear, logical, and convincing in debate, and always presented his contention with such earnestness and candor as to carry conviction where others more eloquent often failed. While he seemed to possess all the nobler attributes of a noble man, the most prominent element in his character, in my judgment, was his rugged, undoubted honesty, so manifest in all his conduct, public and private. To serve twenty-four years in this House without inviting the least suspicion from any source is indeed a glory of which any member, his family, or his friends may well feel proud.

Mr. BLAND was a man of strong convictions, and always had the moral courage to defend them.

In one sense he was a strong partisan. That is, he was a firm believer in the great fundamental principles of the party to which he belonged. He was a Democrat from principle and not for spoils. He would always rather follow his party to defeat battling for its own great truths rather than enjoy victory by false professions. Every page of his Congressional life will show that his energy, his ability, and the strong force of his influence were always used to defeat bad legislation and to secure the passage of those laws which he believed would best subserve the interests of the whole people.

The removal of such an able and useful member from this House is indeed a severe loss that the whole country must suffer. Mr. Speaker, we need more BLANDS in Congress as a veto power on the extravagance of those less cautious and less jealous of the people's rights.

Grand old Missouri has furnished to this House and the Senate her full share of illustrious statesmen, and the exalted life and character of her late "DICK" BLAND will never dim the luster or impair the greatness of Missouri achieved by her distinguished sons in the American Congress.

Mr. BLAND was, by his whole nature, one of the plain people. Whether on his own farm, on the streets of his home town, in the field of politics, or in the halls of Congress, he was at all times the same DICK BLAND. He lived for his family, his friends, and his country, and though his long and eventful career has closed, the noble deeds of his pure heart and exalted mind still remain to honor and glorify his name.

Mr. BLAND departed this life on the 15th day of June, 1899, at his lovely country home near the city of Lebanon, Mo., and was interred in one of the beautiful cemeteries of that city.

Mr. Speaker, it was my mournful privilege to attend his funeral, where the people from his district and all parts of the State and country assembled to lay upon the altar their last offering of affection for a departed friend. There was assembled there indeed a multitude of mourners of all parties, classes, and creeds, to mingle their tears of love and sorrow over the remains of one who had served his country so long, so faithfully, and so well. The universal expression of those who knew him best was, DICK BLAND was a kind and obliging neighbor and friend, an affectionate and indulgent father, and a loving and devoted husband.

We know, Mr. Speaker, the most expressive words of sympathy can only serve to increase the grief and sorrow of those who mourn, but a life so full of noble deeds, love, and virtue ought to be a sweet consolation to his bereaved family and friends. They must feel assured that he has only gone to enjoy that higher reward of Christian virtue, to receive his crown of eternal glory.

Mourn not the dead whose lives declare
That they have nobly borne their part,
For victory's golden crown they wear,
Reserved for every faithful heart.

They rest with glory wrapped around,
Immortal on the scroll of fame.
Their works, their praises shall resound,
Their name, an everlasting name.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, the world respects honest opinions. It hates a trimmer and despises a coward. It reveres and admires a man when he is right, and it still respects him when he is wrong, provided he is honestly wrong.

There were men greater than RICHARD P. BLAND; there were men more eloquent and more profound, but in our day there was none more honest than he. What he said he believed, and what he did was right as he saw the right. His words and votes and deeds were born of the twin parentage of a fertile mind and a clear conscience. All his public acts were inspired by honesty of purpose and characterized by the courage of his convictions. The pathway of his public career had no turns and winds, nor was it ever clouded by any uncertainty as to its direction or by doubts as to its goal. It was rocky, but straight, and always in full view of all the people. His theories were the natural, unpolished results of his logic, and his principles the legitimate, unadulterated conclusions of his philosophy.

Respecting the great question which made Mr. BLAND a national figure, we were antipodes. When I first had the privilege of meeting him as my colleague on this floor, in the Fifty-third Congress, I was deeply impressed by the zeal and earnestness with which he defended his cause; and although fully satisfied in my mind that he was wrong in his premises and mistaken in his conclusions, I am free to confess that to him more than to any other one man on that side of the House were due the frequent reviews to which I time and again subjected my own beliefs and convictions on the subject of finance. When finally that question became a paramount issue of a national campaign, nothing seemed more natural to me, and perhaps to every student of contemporaneous history, than that the veteran pioneer and steadfast advocate of the cause of free silver would be chosen as the standard bearer of his party in that great battle of the standards.

He was the logical candidate, but the Chicago convention willed differently. It recognized his cause, but repudiated the champion. While Mr. BLAND was modestly waiting for the news of his nomination at his humble home at Lebanon, Mo., the convention at Chicago went wild over a speech, carefully prepared, well committed, and adroitly delivered at the right moment by the man who finally snatched the prize from the hands that so richly deserved it. Deserted by his party, defeated in the House of his friends, RICHARD P. BLAND had nothing to comfort him when he retired that night in his little Lebanon house but his own memory of the sacrifices for and the lifelong honest devotion to a cause which had just been accepted as the tenet of his party.

This political reminiscence sets off another striking characteristic of that conspicuous Missourian, his charming modesty. During his long public career there can not be cited a single attempt on his part to unduly push himself to the front. The name and fame he has acquired fell like ripe fruit into his lap, unsought and almost unbeknown to him. It was the natural harvest from the seed he had sown, the logical result of the theories he had championed. Nor was he given to show and ostentation. In fact, it can be truthfully said of him that the virtues of his frugal home life and of his plain personal habits were also the guiding star of his official conduct; and it is not idle praise when I say that he was absolutely free from envy and cant. He was neither a hypocrite nor a pretender, and did not even permit himself to become jealous of the promotion or good fortune of others. He was actuated by no sinister motives or unworthy ambitions, but walked the highway of life a candid, sincere man, resolved to leave the world better for having lived his brief hour.

Others more eloquent than I will do justice to the incidents of his faithful public service, and it is right that this should be done by those who agreed with him politically, by his party friends and associates. My tribute to him concerns the man more than the politician, the citizen more than the statesman; yet his service in public life, in one important respect, was a salutary lesson to all, irrespective of party. James A. Garfield once said he was holding office to prove the possibility of a man being in American public life for many years and yet remaining an honest man. RICHARD P. BLAND, too, has furnished this proof. After a frugal life he died poor. What nobler tribute can we pay to his memory than to call the attention of the world to the example of this American servant? What lesson more salutary and splendid can be taught us and our children than is taught by the personal honesty and integrity of the life of RICHARD P. BLAND? Of all the qualities which make up a public man, integrity of character is, after all, the most important and most precious, and to the memory of the man who possessed it is due our unqualified reverence and respect.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, as a representative of the toiling masses of the great metropolis of the nation, I am here to pay tribute to the memory of one whom they recognized as their unfailing friend and benefactor.

Mr. Speaker, a faithful sentinel of the people was RICHARD P. BLAND. On guard night and day in the venal age of the Republic, he never forgot the countersign of Liberty, and challenged all who approached her camp. He never sought relief from duty at Freedom's outpost, and the Grand Rounds never found him asleep. Nor for an instant did he flinch from duty. Regardless of personal interests, he stood for the people at all times and in all places. Be the weather fair or foul, the glint of his musket was there.

With him there was neither truce nor compromise with those who sought special privileges at the expense of the public. He was neither dismayed at the rapacity of greed nor appalled at the audacity of trusts. All his life was he a true disciple of Thomas Jefferson. "Equal rights for all; special privileges for none," was his motto. He fell battling for the rights of the masses, while exposing the snares of monopoly and defying the mercenary cohorts that threaten the life of the Republic.

RICHARD P. BLAND had no parallel in this age. During his long stay in this House he had no fellow, no model, no likeness. In its shifting scenes he stood alone. Others might change; he never changed. Yet he was no block, no impediment, but an intelligent force, steadily aiming at a goal the attainment of which he believed to be a most wholesome achievement and the greatest benefit he could bestow upon his country.

A vital factor in our return to specie payment after the war, he had restored to the people the dollar of their fathers. The Bland dollar was not only the coinage of the mint, but the coinage of his brain. It is to-day a living evidence of his statesmanship. Well did Charles A. Dana say of it—

It is the only practical evidence of financial statesmanship evolved in Congress for many years.

Although insidiously deprived of the fruits of his victory, BLAND did not lose heart. Having abiding faith in the people, he led a crusade against the Saracen. He opened anew the fight for bimetallism. It was a persistent and a glorious fight—one not yet ended. All admire the gallant struggle made to-day for the freedom of the Transvaal. BLAND stood as firmly for free coinage. He defended every kopje, traversed every velde, and fought with a tenacity that astonished the world. His attacks upon the opposition were so well delivered, strenuous, and sustained, that at times he drove his adversaries to insincere and humiliating devices. At times victory seemed to be almost within his grasp, at times as hopeless as the search for the philosopher's stone. In every vicissitude he was beset by desertions, in every crisis loaded with obloquy. His prowess breasted every difficulty—

Like to the Pontic Sea,
Whose icy current and compulsive course
Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but keeps due on To the Propontic and the Hellespont.

Think for a moment, Mr. Speaker, of the bright satellites that set out with him on what seemed like a holiday excursion. How many fell by the way! How many turned against him! Look over this House, take a glance at the Senate—aye, cast your eyes even upon the Presidential chair—and then compute, if you can, the strength of the mighty tide that turned against him. And yet, undaunted, unswerving, uncomplaining, he held his course with undeviating fidelity.

He was as constant and abiding as the northern star amid a shower of swerving meteors. Defying mutiny, like the great navigator who gave mankind a new world, his hope ne'er dimmed, his purpose never changed. However wild the tempest, however strong the bellowing flood of passion, he pursued an unvarying course. He was the great political navigator of the people, sailing upon the ocean of destiny, with the Declaration of Independence as his guiding star and the Constitution as his compass.

Mr. Speaker, this Hall is still ringing with his manly words. They were the coinage of his convictions. His sincerity alone would have made him more than conspicuous; his ability and devotion to the principles advocated so persistently made him truly great. He had an academic but no collegiate training; nor had he traveled in the realm of metaphysical disquisition; but he had delved in the gold and silver mines of the Pacific slope, had practiced law, and fought Indians on the border, and, like Cincinnatus of old, had followed the plow. It was a grand training for the rôle which he was to fill. Born in Kentucky, every fiber of his body, every filament of his brain, every scintillation of his intellect was American.

There was a halo about him at all times that forbade either the charge or thought of selfishness. His life was a chapter of consistent and faultless logic. Oratory can not adorn it; detraction can not deface it.

Sir, memory is a never-fading mirror. It reflects the scenes of other days. We who knew him can still see that modest but firm man rising here in his place, treading these aisles, stopping to meet an inquiry, turning firmly to an attack, leading an onset, never beating a retreat.

RICHARD P. BLAND was a fitting type of the old-time statesman, now, alas, fading away. He belonged to the generation that produced the founders of the Republic. He had the true Revolutionary grit. He would have been a worthy colleague of Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe. He was a builder, not a destroyer. He strove to pull down everything vicious in statesmanship and to raise everything wholesome to a common level.

Whether on the floor, in committee, or listening to chat in the cloakroom, he was essentially thoughtful. There was a rippling strain of humor about him, but his face never lost its cast of thoughtfulness. His friendship was sterling silver; his affection pure gold. Sir, I rejoice in my affiliation with such a man. It is better than gold and precious stones. He left his imprint upon the legislation of this House. When the seeker after truth comes to study the great men who have shaped the destinies of the Republic, he will find RICHARD P. BLAND among the immortals. Future historians will linger o'er his name and gladly preserve his fame.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, whether regarded as an unflinching Democrat, unwaveringly true to his party, as a statesman sweeping a broad field of vision, or as a patriot sincerely striving for his country's good, it can be truthfully said that few men in America, in making an honest, straightforward fight for plain, economic principles, have attained a wider or worthier fame than Mr. BLAND. Wherever the English language is spoken has gone the name and fame for rugged honesty, self-sacrifice, and devotion to duty of the great Missourian, RICHARD P. BLAND; especially for that long and heroic fight he made for the great cause of bimetallism, which he regarded as a struggle for the rights of the human race.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but far beyond the vast sweep of the world where the English language is spoken, in far-away, silver-using China and Japan, and in far-away India, whose people he regarded as suffering in part from the same financial cause against which he battled here, there is admiration and reverence for the name of RICHARD P. BLAND.

For nearly a decade it was my privilege and honor to be associated with him in sympathy and in service in this Hall and in battling for the same cause; and I can truthfully say that in all my life I never knew a more honest man nor a man so tremendously in earnest as RICHARD P. BLAND.

I, sir, will never forget the look of mingled pain and indignation that came over his grand features in 1892 and 1893 when he realized and saw that many, very many, whose support for silver he had relied on were turning their backs on the standard. It smote his great heart like an intense personal grief. No American constituency ever had a more loyal and devoted representative than the people who gave their votes and confidence to RICHARD P. BLAND. What Morley and Bright and Gladstone were to England, BLAND was to America. He was indeed the great American commoner, and spent the best years of his life in battling for popular rights. For this reason, sir, his name will be held in affectionate remembrance and enshrined in the hearts of the plain people all over this broad land, north and south, east and west. His death was a distinct loss to them, and as such they felt it; and the day when its sad tidings swept over this land there was grief in many thousand American homes and tears in the eyes of many not accustomed to weep.

He was, sir, truly a grand man, and all the grander from his simple faith and trust in the people. He believed that their impulses were always right, and that in the end they would vindicate the conduct and action of every man who had trusted and stayed true to them. In that honest faith he lived, and in that honest faith he died. No double dealing nor sharp practices could ever be charged against RICHARD P. BLAND. He never fought from ambush; he stayed always in the open. He never sought to wield the polished Damascus blade, but, like Richard the Lion-Hearted, it was the broad, honest battle-ax that fitted his manly hands, with which in his early manhood he had fought the savage Indians in the Western wilds. The people intuitively felt that he was their champion, and as such they loved and trusted him.

And, Mr. Speaker, I stand here now to say that it will be many a day before they will have a champion so bold and so devoted to stand up here for them and battle for their rights in this Hall. His motto in life seems to have been, "Be manly, fearless, straightforward, and honest, and God will do the rest." That idea seems to have been ever present with him. And in watching his course and conduct here I was often reminded of the verse:

Howe'er it be, it seems to me,
'Tis only noble to be good.
Kind hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Speaker, others have known Mr. BLAND more intimately than I. They have been associated with him more nearly than I, but I presume it is true that I have known him longer than any man who belongs to this Congress. It was my pleasure to meet him in the year 1872, when he was first the nominee of his party for a seat in the Forty-third Congress.

I was a very young man in politics then, and I was struck the day I met him with one thing, which followed him all the days of his life, and that was his exceeding great modesty. He was in a country where he had lived before he assumed his home at Lebanon; hundreds of men knew him personally, and at each complimentary remark that was made to him he seemed to draw back and be abashed, and, as young as I was in the political world, I wondered if a man with such great personal modesty could make himself felt in public life.

It was a distinguishing trait of the man, and has been evidenced by every man who has spoken here to-day. If it detracted from his fame—and I am of opinion that it did—it was a misfortune to the world more than to him.

If there was another characteristic that was marked and prominent to a degree in Mr. BLAND, it was fixedness of purpose, followed by stern integrity. In spite of his modesty as a public man, a public official, whenever he saw that what he believed to be the rights of the masses of the people were being assailed, his modesty fled for the time and gave way to his more exalted idea of his duty toward the people, and he was as fearless in repelling attacks as he was in making attacks under such circumstances.

The discussion has been had a great many times as to whether or not Mr. BLAND was a great man. It is according to the point of view of the individual who decides what a great man is. I have believed for a number of years that Mr. BLAND deserved to be called a great man.

What does it take to make a great man, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen? It seems to me it takes fixedness of purpose, integrity of character, individual honesty, and a disposition to inform one's self as to what the right is, and once being informed, to follow the right and to be a good man rather than extra intelligent. If that is a fair definition of what it is to be a great man, then Mr. BLAND was a great man.

I remember some years ago—I think he was serving his ninth term in Congress—being at the capital city of our State, sitting by an old-fashioned fireplace in a hotel office, I heard several bright young men, who each had more or less worthy ambitions, discussing Mr. BLAND. I was taking no part in the conversation, but they agreed among themselves that Mr. BLAND was a man of one idea, and that he could not claim to be a great man, or even a superior man, or an extraordinary man. Finally one of them, and a very bright man he is yet, turned to me and said, "What do you think about it?" "Well," I said, "I want to ask you a question or two. Mr. BLAND is serving his eighteenth year in the American Congress. Do you, or any of you gentlemen, know of a single public speech which he has made or a single vote which he has ever cast in Congress that has been criticised by the men who made him a Representative?"

That question caused a pause in the conversation, and one and all agreed that they did not. I said, "First and last he has represented nearly thirty counties, coming from the changes that have been made in his district, and a man must have something superior in him, he must have good information on fundamentals, he must have extra integrity, and he must be schooled in the doctrines and policies that his people believe in, or in all these years there would have been some criticism of some public word or act of his."

It was my pleasure to call the attention of these young men, all of the same party as Mr. BLAND and myself, to these characteristics of him. I think these are the things that made him great. He was exceedingly well informed as to the doctrines of our great party, and he voted and spoke as he was informed.

Now, you may say that a man who lived like Mr. BLAND and who talked like Mr. BLAND and who voted like Mr. BLAND might have done it on his own individuality, but it is true, nevertheless, that his public utterances and his votes and his whole life, as the people saw it, were in accord with the declarations made by the first President of this century just going out. If one will read the inaugural address of Mr. Jefferson as to what he believed his Administration and his party ought to do, and then read the utterances and acts of Mr. BLAND, he will find that he drank at the head of the fountain of our party principles.

My close association with Mr. BLAND came with the late years of his life. When he first took up the cudgels for the relief of silver from the chains which had been forged for it in 1873, he had no opposition on that question to amount to anything in the West. I know that in the campaigns of 1874, 1876, 1878, and to 1885, no man of any party in the great State of Missouri said "nay" to the proposition for the full remonetization of the silver dollar. Public sentiment was all one way. But there came some little question about the matter from 1885 to 1889, and from that time on the remonetization of silver was a burning question.

Nobody doubted how Missouri stood on the question or what the views of our people were when they were permitted to express themselves. But, strange to say, shortly after the inauguration of a President in 1893 a new evangel seemed to have gotten into the air of our great State; and though the first battle was won in 1894 with great ease, by more than 4 to 1, yet the opposition was shrewd enough to get control of the party machinery in Missouri. In the spring of 1895, when the question became the all-absorbing one above all other questions, and when the disposition of the people was to get together, as they believed, in accordance with their constitutional right, to express themselves on the question, we found to our amazement the committee 5 to 1 against the right of the party to express itself.

The party's hands were tied. It was then, in our anxiety to know where to turn, that the "bugle call" came from the farm of RICHARD P. BLAND. The people by petition to the committee insisted upon the right to express themselves in regular form on the burning question of the hour. This demand was followed by such a fight as no party in Missouri ever had within its own ranks before, and such as I hope we may never have again. Suffice it to say that at last, after abasing ourselves, we were permitted to have the convention called in regular order.

Mr. BLAND was the spirit, the life, the power of that great convention. In my opinion the most remarkably strong body of men ever congregated at one time in Missouri was at Pertle Springs in August, 1895. There was no thought on the part of Mr. BLAND of any personal ambition connected with the question. The talk then and there was that he ought to be the man whom Missouri would push to the front for the Presidential nomination. But he raised his voice against that continually, saying, "We must not confound this question with the ambition of any man."

Over and over again I heard that or similar declarations from him. The party expressed itself in no uncertain way. It was the initial fight which led to the great party declaration which followed in 1896. And I believe I can say—I believe that those who hear me think as I do—that to RICHARD P. BLAND, more than to anybody or everybody else, is due the fact that the old party is on the platform of its fathers to-day. This plain, modest man of the people stood like a lion in the path of monometallism.

When we came to choose delegates to the national convention of 1896, Mr. BLAND was present. It was generally believed he would be one of the delegates. On the day before the convention met, on the night before, and on the day of the convention and into the night his friends from all parts of the State were beseeching him to permit them to make him the standard bearer of the party by instructing the delegation to Chicago for him. But he consistently and persistently declined and refused; and it was well into the night of the convention day before he finally agreed that they might use his name. He said to the last, "I have no desire in this direction; I have no ambition for this nomination, and I am only afraid that my friends, thrusting my personality into this contest, may confuse the greater question."

Right there, Mr. Speaker, we have what to my mind is an evidence of greatness. To him the cause was everything. No American who knew Mr. BLAND fairly well would doubt for one minute that he would do and say that thing which he believed to be right, regardless of what the consequences were, unless it might become hurtful to his people, and then perhaps he would keep silent for their good.

His personal integrity was as high as that of any man we have known. A good deal has been said to-day about his honesty. Mr. Speaker, honesty ought not to be so rare among public men as to call forth comment; but, strange to say, this man's name was associated more with personal honesty than with any other characteristic of his life, and to call him honest is but the bare truth. It is a heritage to his children that they may nurse to their bosoms all the days of their lives. They sprang from the loins of a good and honest man.

Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to enter the sacred precincts of the home life of Mr. BLAND. It has already been adverted to; and others knew his home life better than I, and have alluded to it in becoming language. What, among his other virtues, always struck me about Mr. BLAND was this: After he had been in Congress years and years, after his name had become a household word in State after State of the Union, after his utterances had been read approvingly in all the enlightened countries of the world, after he had become famous as a statesman, he was the same plain, simple man that he was when I first knew him as a candidate.

I have noticed with other men who attain distinction in public life that if they are not called "Judge" or "Senator" or "General," they are at least addressed as "Mr." after they become men of character in the country. But the neighbors of Mr. BLAND, with seeming unanimity, always talked of him or addressed him as "Dick." He was one of the people; he never got beyond the people. It seems to me that Mr. BLAND'S thoughts, certainly his acts, were on the line of the people's needs.

It seems to me his feeling was that "special interests can take care of themselves; the rich, the powerful, the accomplished, the educated man can care for himself; it is the plain, humble citizen, many times unlettered, who needs the care and protection of the legislator." Mr. BLAND'S whole life work as a public man seems to have been along this line. We shall not soon see another like him. In his own home, surrounded by those who loved him and those whom he loved, in old Missouri, the State he had chosen for his, RICHARD P. BLAND went to his rest, and there in the graveyard of his people "after life's fitful fever he sleeps well."

Mr. ROBB. Mr. Speaker, in paying this brief tribute to the memory of the illustrious citizen whose earthly career is ended I recognize that no words of mine can add to the honor of his name; no sentiment which I can express more closely draw around his memory the veneration and love of his countrymen.

To have been, as I was, an associate of Mr. BLAND'S in only one, which was the last, of the many Congresses of which he was so distinguished and able a member; to have been a colleague of his from the great State which he served so long and faithfully, is to have felt the ennobling and elevating influence of his great character and to be the better in the contemplation of his many virtues.

Man's life is valuable for the good which he accomplishes, the wise policies which he inaugurates, the reforms which he encourages and promotes, and the worthy example which he sets before men. And though we speak of our departed brother as dead, miss his kindly presence, and deeply feel the loss of one whose honesty of purpose, high conception of public duty, and ripened experience were of such incalculable value in directing the nation along the pathway of national integrity, yet he still lives in his life work, which is a living inspiration to high and noble endeavor. His life has not been in vain.

No—

> Wave of dark oblivion's sea will sweep across the place
> To leave no track nor trace—of this great man.

Though not with us in the flesh and in the body, the sphere of his influence and usefulness extends beyond the grave, touches the heart, appeals to the conscience, and directs the way which justice and honor lead.

He was neither a bigot nor a timeserver; neither was he negative in disposition, but positive and aggressive, and what he stood for was made plain and clear, and he gave a conscientious and fearless support to what he believed to be right and for the best interests of his country. Of simplicity of manner, a plain and unaffected man, fair and open in all his dealings and in the treatment of public questions, neither envious nor vainglorious, shunning rather than seeking power, searching always for truth and justice, faithful in the performance of every trust, he justly earned the place he occupied in the hearts and affections of his countrymen.

We but faintly express our thoughts or the feelings emanating from our hearts when we say that we are proud of the historic place which will be accorded him in the nation's history.

In honoring and trusting him Missourians have been especially honored; in him the plane of American statesmanship has been elevated, and through him mankind has been benefited.

Fighting the cause of the common people consistently, persistently, and patriotically through his long legislative career, he was of the best and truest representative of the highest and best type of American manhood and American statesmanship. Admiration and confidence followed him while living; gratitude and love follow him when dead.

> To the dark grave retiring as to rest;
> Thy people blessing, by thy people blessed.

Mr. PEARCE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to conceive of two men whose political opinions were more diametrically opposed than those of the late Mr. BLAND and myself. For twenty-five years and more in the great State in which we have lived and in the forum of debate both of us have always strenuously contended, in season and out of season, for the principles which we believed to be right, yielding nothing and compromising nothing.

But notwithstanding the sharp lines of political contention, it is a pleasure for me to testify that no personal asperities ever arose between us, and on this memorial day, together with my colleagues, I bring to the grave my wreath of sweet scented flowers and erect to the memory of the departed my tribute of respect.

I love a brave man. On many a battlefield my soul was agonized to see heroic lives go out which the country needed and which the world could ill spare. Some of them have been my comrades and some of them, none the less brave, have been my enemies, but comrades all in the hour of death. Perhaps—I believe it is so; I hope it is so—a few drops at least of the red stream of life which flowed from gaping wounds became mingled with my own young blood to make me more earnestly consecrated to the good of my country and the well-being of my fellow-men.

Mr. Speaker, the passing of a good citizen and an honest man is always a public calamity. Not that men of that high quality are exceptional in our country, for there are more in every station of life than the country has the credit of possessing. But such lives constitute influences so great in the present for the conservation of the best interests of society, and so great in the future in molding the character and the ambition of the young, that none of that high degree can leave the stage of life's activities without leaving a painful void behind.

Among all the peoples of the world this beloved country of ours stands preeminent—yes, peerless—for its great average of intelligence, of energy, of honesty, of courage, of patriotism, and of self-sacrificing devotion to adopted principles.

The world is none the worse—nay, it is infinitely better off—because we do not all think alike. The great conserving laws which are writ upon the statute book are the resultant of the clash of mind with mind. As Edmund Burke truthfully said, "Rude ages"—when men did not think—"rude ages exhibit the triumph of power over reason." And so it would be with modern ages if all minds worked in the same political groove. The resultant of intellectual contention is not always immediately wise; but if it is unwise, the grind goes on, fermentation continues, and in the fullness of time the waters clear and the sparkling crystals of truth shine in the light of day.

Mr. BLAND and I were never in intimate relations, our industrial lives were cast upon different lines; but I do not hesitate to say that in the cause which he early espoused no more heroic gladiator ever lived and none ever struck a harder blow. And yet, with all this fierce and earnest contentiousness, there was a beautiful simplicity in his private life which to my mind illustrates and eloquently emphasizes the glory of the American home, that haven of rest where conjugal love finds its most complete expression—the home where the warrior, after the fierce conflicts of the day, can lay his armor off and sleep the sleep of him who has the consciousness of duty well performed.

I have a sincere admiration of RICHARD P. BLAND. I admire him because, although a political opponent, he was a great statesman, a debater of great force, and a pioneer who never failed to hew to the line which his vision had marked. Tempted of honor and power, I believe him to have been incorruptible, and he died as he had lived, best beloved by those who knew him best, a faithful servant of his country, a simple-hearted, honest man. If he had been a Cæsar I could not say as much. If he had been a Cincinnatus I could say no more. His memory is the heritage of the future, and if every man leaving for that bourne whence no traveler returns bequeathed to posterity a heritage equally good, well might we believe that this country of ours was founded upon the rock of the eternal ages.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Speaker, in paying this humble tribute to the memory of RICHARD PARKS BLAND I leave the biography of his life to other and older friends. The incidents of his long and useful public life and the touching illustrations of his private character will become the inspiring theme of a worthy and painstaking biographer.

I come to lay this brief token of affection upon the altar of his memory, not as a narrator, but as a student who would draw a wholesome lesson from a great career. In short, I would speak as a pupil who has been elevated by his character and instructed by his wisdom.

I thank God for the career of a great man. It is a national blessing. With Thomas Carlyle, I sympathize with the nation that has no great men or has ceased to produce them.

Especially I am thankful that RICHARD P. BLAND has demonstrated that the highest success may be achieved by the simplest methods. It is no vapid vaporing of praise to say that his success was of the highest order if measured by the highest standard. Though he missed the Presidency, he earned it, which is greater; and no man in our history ever more richly deserved it. But, like Henry Clay and a few others, he was too prominently identified with the vital issues of the day to be successful as a Presidential candidate.

It is the misfortune of our country that strong championship of great measures is too often considered a disqualification for that high office.

But in a higher sense our dead friend still presides over the destinies of the great party which he loved and served so well and whose slogan still is the battle cry which his voice was first to raise.

The cause for which he fought is still the cause of humanity and true Democracy, and the organization of a party of six and a half millions of American freemen standing to-day for the cause which is hallowed by more than twenty years of his service constitutes the highest tribute to his wisdom and the noblest monument which perpetuates his fame.

Mr. Speaker, the one lesson which the student of American politics should draw from the career of our departed friend is that true greatness consists in a double combination of qualities of the head and the heart—a clear conception of truth and a sublime simplicity of motive.

The brilliancy of genius may flash for a moment, and we enjoy it; but genius is a meteor. Political shrewdness may achieve startling surprises, and people call it success; but of such achievement mankind has uttered its condemnation in the words of Victor Hugo:

> Success, that pretender to talent! * * * confounds the radiance of the stars of heaven with the radiations which a duck's foot leaves in the mud.

I say I thank God that an American statesman, a Missourian, has proven that a long series of political successes may be won on merit; that it was never necessary for RICHARD P. BLAND to resort to any of the trickery, the scheming, or the double dealing of smaller minds. With him honesty was not only the best policy, but no other policy was to be considered. If the purchase of a single vote would have won him the Presidency, he would have scorned it.

The perfect simplicity of his character and the purity of his life will ever stand as the rich heritage of his children and the encouragement of all who doubt whether or not political preferment can be achieved without some form of political trickery.

A great leader has fallen; but he has left us a great example. His clear eye flashed over the field of political conflict and pointed out the path for his party twenty years in advance of his fellows. His steady purpose never faltered, and he finally brought them to see it.

Here we have the measure of the man, the two chief characteristics which entitle him to rank with the good and the great men of our history—a clear head and a brave heart, a comprehensive grasp of the great problem of government, and a sublime simplicity of purpose like that which always distinguishes true greatness from meretricious display.

If it be true that "an institution is but the lengthened shadow of a man," how nobly has our departed leader earned the honors of the organization which perpetuates the principle which he left to inspire us; and as the substance outweighs the shadow, we shall not forget that the truth which he taught was not a shadow but a divine light, the radiance of which shall yet illumine the world.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, RICHARD P. BLAND was one of Missouri's greatest sons. He might well occupy space in statuary in yonder hall beside Benton and Blair, who have been selected as the best representatives of the dead of that State.

With a life full of good deeds and a public record of devotion to his country, he yielded to the grim messenger and departed hence. Man would avoid this journey and shrinks from the contemplation of it, but ere long the mightiest is overcome by it. Its mysteries are unexplained. Its devious path is descended, but never ascended, and none return to explain the traveler's experience.

Mr. BLAND was buried near a hickory tree in a beautiful cemetery at Lebanon, Mo., where the western sun shall ever cast its rays upon his grave. A fitting monument to his character is this living tree. Whether amid the flowers of spring, the heat of summer, the decadence of autumn, or the blasts of winter, it remains the same sturdy tree. In the vigor of youth, amidst the activities of manhood, in the decline of age, or with the chilling waves of death about him, Mr. BLAND possessed the same elements of greatness.

The tree, however, will finally die and be forgotten, but the name of the dust now at its roots will be remembered and honored when the illustrious dead of this nation shall be recounted.

Mr. BLAND'S death was a shock to me. I felt that one of my most valued friends had gone, one whom I could approach about any of the perplexities surrounding me; but this experience is not mine alone. Scores of others sought his counsel and were encouraged by the same friendly interest. He was not sentimental or flippant. He was quiet, modest, and unostentatious. He was sincere, devoted, and practical. He was a man of rare character and upright life. He was free from duplicity. He was plain-spoken, but in his frankness he accorded to others the same rights of opinion and judgment which he expected for himself. He was chaste and courteous in language.

> His armor was his honest thought,
> And simple truth his utmost skill.

Mr. BLAND was a patriotic American. He was proud of his Government and its institutions. He believed in its perpetuity and the honor of its citizenship. He rejoiced in the fidelity of public servants and recognized the will of the people as supreme. He fearlessly advocated what he believed was right, without display of oratory, but with force and effect. One great element of his strength was his integrity. No one doubted the sincerity of his statements.

At no place was he more attractive than in his home life. Surrounded by a loving and devoted family, he showed that simplicity of style, ease in association, and hospitality in manner which were almost ideal. Wherever he was found, in home, in society, or in official station, he exhibited the same personality.

It is said that death is the enemy of mankind. So it is; but since its work must be wrought, let us not say it may not sometimes be well to lay off the garments of life in the midst of active usefulness, before the yellow leaf of age and affliction's painful hand shall have borne too heavily upon the subject. It may be we should not regard Mr. BLAND'S death as untimely, but as the taking of the ripened grain before the mildew of years had marred it. The every page of his life now lies fresh before us, that we may scan it and with hearts attuned to the spirit of his goodness we may imitate the lofty example of his fidelity to his family and friends and follow in his footsteps in our consecration to the cause of the people and devotion to their best interests.

And now shall we turn our eyes to the future and remember that there is an overruling Providence who doeth all things well and hope for the enjoyment of the felicity of that celestial country where at last shall be found—

The day that hath no evening,
The health that hath no sore,
The light that hath no ending,
But lasteth evermore.

[Mr. JOY addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. COONEY. Mr. Speaker, "Put the cause above the man!" These are the memorable words telegraphed by Mr. BLAND to his friends at Chicago on the 7th day of July, 1896, when they were pushing his claims for the Presidency on the ground of State instructions. In this simple sentence he has left us his own biography. No other public man in his time has so linked life and fortune with a great cause, and lifted it above and free from his own ambition and personality.

In that compendium of the world's great orations soon to issue from the hand of Justice Brewer, not a sentence uttered by Mr. BLAND is likely to be preserved. But humanity has placed him in its own choice circle. It selects its favorites by what they have done and what they have stood for, as well as what they have said. They are not as numerous as the world's great intellects; they are rarer than its great orators; their moral example reaches down to all men and touches them with a human sympathy that is an inspiration and an elevation. BLAND is one of these, and the impress of his character will be felt in the public life of generations that follow him. To be rich, powerful, or illustrious was nothing to him. He regarded great learning and brilliancy as mighty little in themselves; but that he who would be true and useful must devote his gifts to his countrymen and fellowship with the misfortunes of humanity.

What the public life of the Republic needs to-day is not more powerful men, more great men, or brilliant intellects, but more men who "put the cause above the man."

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, it is quite usual for the casual thinker to say that individuals count for little here and that no one falls but some other equally good, and often better, steps forward to take his place.

What a fallacy! Often one falls in the ranks of his countrymen who leaves a real void for generations.

The lamented RICHARD P. BLAND was of that natural, sterling, honest type quite common to the early settlements of this country, but which is rapidly becoming extinct.

He was not tainted with the mad mercenary spirit so common to the present generation. He believed that there were things more sacred than piling up wealth. He believed that a public office was a public trust that should be executed with an unyielding fidelity, and during his long service here he never touched any questionable piece of legislation wherein he or any of his friends or others could obtain any special benefit. He abhorred the idea of any individual seeking to benefit by special legislation. He scorned the practice of expending one dollar of public funds for anything not wholly for the public weal.

He detested the practice of expending public funds more lavishly than the ordinary individual does his private funds, and he seemed to ever keep in view the principle that we should run the Government on the same careful and economic basis as we would do were we paying the expenses ourselves. He not only never sought to abuse the trust confided in him by seeking special benefits, but he always indignantly refused to accept any privileges not clearly within the purview of those plainly and unquestionably extended to the office by law. A Congress of such men would be of invaluable service to the American people.

He was reared in an age when men and principles were paramount to any expedients, and at a time when catering to arrogant greed, whether against our own people or other races, was offensive to the aspirations of the ordinary American citizen.

He never made a dollar, directly or indirectly, beyond the salary attached to the office, and he regarded it as much a theft to purloin money from the public Treasury as he did to filch it from a private purse.

He not only had a well-developed private conscience but as well a sterling public conscience. It was passing strange to him that anyone could be strictly upright and cautious in his private dealings and loose and reckless in his dealings with the public.

He was generous to a fault in his charities for the shortcomings of others. He had not a tinge of envy or jealousy about his being. When he came so nearly being nominated for President of the United States and lost this great honor by reason of a matchless development of leadership of one of the delegates that stampeded the convention to him, he never was heard to murmur or whine or complain, but buckled on his armor and went forth to the political battlefield and there delineated the great and deserving traits of charactor of his victor, and as long as he lived he was one of the warmest supporters of his successful adversary.

During many years prior to his death it was evident that his constitution was shattered and that disease had made serious inroads upon his system, yet he was always in his seat and ever ready to raise his voice and to cast his vote for what he considered the greatest good to the greatest and most deserving number.

It is most lamentable to lose one of these distinct landmarks that count so much in our body politic.

His name and his conduct will ever be held by those who served with him here as something worthy of emulation during the ages. Of him it can be said that not only his family, city, and State but the whole people lose, and sorely regret his untimely death.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, some gentlemen who wished to take part in these exercises are not here, and therefore I ask that those members desiring to do so may print in the RECORD remarks upon Mr. BLAND'S life and character.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ROBB). The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that those members who desire to do so may print remarks in the RECORD on the life and character of the late Mr. BLAND. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask further that leave be given to print in the RECORD some addresses made at Mr. BLAND'S funeral, and some resolutions suggested by the announcement of his death.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's further request?

There was no objection.

And then (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the resolutions previously adopted, and as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Surgeon-General of the Army inclosing a draft of a bill relating to leaves of absence for acting assistant surgeons of the Army, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10153) appropriating $1,500 to investigate the fishery interests on the Pacific coast, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 949); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9496) to provide for the disposal of the Fort Buford abandoned military reservation, in the States of North Dakota and Montana, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 950); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LOUD, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10374) to amend the laws relating to the second class of mail matter, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 951); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10025) for the relief of James N. Robinson and Sallie B. McComb, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 945); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WEAVER, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred House bill 6030, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 214) for the relief of Eliza S. Beard, widow of William Beard, late of Camp Dennison, Hamilton County, Ohio, accompanied by a report (No. 946); which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred House bill 3124, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 216) for the relief of Jacob Walker, son and assignee of Thornton Ralls, accompanied by a report (No. 947); which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8283) for the relief of Harry H. Thomas and others, members of the regimental band of the Fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 948); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles; which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10147) granting a pension to Delia A. Jones—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 10222) providing for the erection of engine house and the purchase of a chemical engine at Congress Heights, D. C.—Committee on the District of Columbia discharged, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (H. R. 10223) for improvement of Navy-Yard Bridge, at Washington, D. C.—Committee on the District of Columbia discharged, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS INTRODUCED.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 9, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I think the Journal should be read. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and it will be read.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

SHIP EUNICE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the vessel ship Eunice, Thomas Seal, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL BRIDGE ACROSS THE POTOMAC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting the report of the board of officers of the Corps of Engineers and of architects appointed by order of the Secretary of War to consider and report upon the relative merits of the designs submitted for a memorial bridge to be constructed across the Potomac River, at Washington; which, on motion of Mr. HANSBROUGH, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF DIRECTOR OF THE MINT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be 6,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals for the calendar year 1898, bound in cloth and wrapped, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Resolved, That there also be printed 7,500 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint covering the operations of the mints and assay offices of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, to be bound in cloth and wrapped, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 for the use of the Director of the Mint.

BUREAU OF AMERICAN ETHNOLOGY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office 8,000 copies of any matter furnished by the Director of the Bureau of American Ethnology relating to researches and discoveries connected with the study of the American aborigines, the same to be issued as bulletins uniform with the annual reports, 1,500 of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,500 for distribution by the Bureau.

GOVERNMENT FOR HAWAII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. CULLOM. I will simply ask that the bill lie on the table and be printed, before I request a conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will lie on the table and be printed.

CONSTRUCTION OF WAR SHIPS AT NAVY-YARDS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I present a letter from H. W. Dennett, E. M. Kelley, and H. Prevost, a committee of Mount Washington Lodge No. 276, International Association of Machinists, of Concord, N. H., asking that a portion of the Government work on the new war ships be given to the navy-yards of the country in place of being given to private shipyards.

I desire simply to say that I sympathize with this request. I never have been able to quite understand why we should have these expensive navy-yards in the country and then proceed to give pretty nearly all of the work to private shipyards. I presume it is done on the plea of economy, but it seems to me it is a false economy and that some of this work ought to go to the navy-yards of the country.

I move that the letter be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

MUZZLING OF DOGS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been requested to present a petition of 2,000 citizens of the District of Columbia, protesting against the order that is now in force muzzling the dogs in this District. I will read a letter, addressed to me, which accompanies the petition:

By resolution of a mass meeting of the owners and the friends of the dog, held at the National Rifles Armory on the 30th ultimo, I was directed to present to the honorable District Commissioners a petition signed by 2,000 persons in this city protesting against the muzzle order issued December last for the muzzling of all dogs running at large in the District of Columbia. In accordance with instructions received at that meeting I did, on the 2d instant, present to the said Commissioners the aforesaid protest, together with an argument against a continuance of the muzzle order.

Under date of April 4, the Commissioners of the District, through their secretary, have advised me that, on account of the fact that the subject is being considered by a committee of the Senate, they did not deem it advisable to take any steps looking to a rescinding of the order pending their action, and therefore returned the petition and accompanying papers to me.

Complying with further instructions of the mass meeting that, in the event of the Commissioners refusing to take any action looking to a rescinding of the proclamation in question, I was to present the petition, through you, to the proper committee having this investigation in charge. I therefore transmit, for the information of the committee, all the papers connected with this matter, and earnestly beg that early legislation may be had annulling the proclamation of the District Commissioners, for the reason that we believe it will be both cruel and inhuman to require the dogs to be muzzled in the approaching hot season.

If I may be permitted to do so I would suggest that section 7 of the act of June 19, 1878 (20 U. S. Stat., page 174), be indefinitely suspended or repealed and that an amendment to that effect be incorporated in the District appropriation bill now being considered by your committee.

Very respectfully,

GEO. W EVANS.

Chairman of the meeting of the friends of the dogs.

Among the petitioners, Mr. President, I find the names of Rev. A. Mackay-Smith; Surgeon-General Moore, U. S. A.; General Cragin; Henry E. Davis, United States District Attorney; Hon. A. G. Riddle, Mrs. A. L. Barber, Mary Foote Henderson; the president, secretary, and other officers of the Humane Society; W. F. MacLennan, Dr. George B. Simpson, Dr. Ed. R. Young, Dr. E. C. Barstow, Dr. F. X. Dooley, Dr. Percy M. Cox, Judge McCammon, Dr. Reginald Munson, Dr. W. C. Billings, Dr. W. J. Dillenback, Dr. J. W. Anderson, Dr. J. F. Kernan, Dr. P. E. Nagle, Dr. Horace Coleman, Dr. James Laws, Dr. J. R. Hayes, Dr. Robert R. Cooke, Dr. Fred Swett, Dr. J. H. Johnson, Dr. Henry Darling, and Veterinary Surgeon W. C. Kempton, and many others well known in this community.

In reference to the matter, Mr. President, I desire simply to say, on my own responsibility, that I regard this order as an unnecessary, unjust, and cruel one, and trust that the District Commissioners may see the propriety and good sense of revoking it at an early day.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator a question before that matter is disposed of. I ask it for my own information. I should like to ask my friend, who is an eminent physician and surgeon, whether he believes there is any such disease as hydrophobia?

Mr. GALLINGER. In answer to that I will say to the Senator that I practiced medicine for thirty years and never saw a case of hydrophobia, and that I have asked a great many very eminent surgeons who have spent a lifetime in the hospitals of the United States, who said to me that they never saw a case of hydrophobia. Dr. Mary Putnam Jacobi, who gave testimony a few days ago before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and who has been for a long time in practice in the city of New York, in making some suggestions regarding hydrophobia said in reply to a question from me that she never saw a case of hydrophobia.

I will say, Mr. President, that in my opinion—it may not be worth much—hydrophobia is a disease almost unknown, and if a case has occurred in this city it was an isolated case.

Now, Mr. President, just one word more in reference to the order that is in vogue in this District. Some young scientist in Washington (we have them here as we have them elsewhere), for the purpose, as I believe, of self-glorification, made an examination of a dog's brain and came to the conclusion that the dog had rabies. Immediately that was reported, and this order was the result.

I believe it is a well-established fact that the test that was in vogue in England last year to determine rabies by an examination of the brain of dogs has been entirely abandoned, and that this year they have a new test, which they claim is all right, and that it does determine the existence of the disease.

I do not believe there has been a case of rabies in the District of Columbia this year, last year, nor the year before; nor have I the least apprehension that if these poor dogs are allowed the freedom that man's best friend ought to have we will be troubled with hydrophobia as a result.

Now, Mr. President, my opinion may not be worth anything. I give it for what it is worth.

Mr. VEST. I do not propose to express any expert opinion on the matter. I remember when I was a very young man, which was a number of years ago, I sat up with an associate who died with all the symptoms of hydrophobia. He was thrown into convulsions by the appearance of water and barked like a dog, and the physician——

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, in hydrophobia the patient does not bark like a dog. That is not one of the symptoms at all.

Mr. VEST. Very good; but the physician in Lexington, Ky., and we had there the most celebrated surgeons in the world almost at that time, Dr. Ben Dudley, pronounced it hydrophobia; I know nothing about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not desire to controvert the opinion. All that I meant to say was that barking like a dog is not a symptom of hydrophobia and can not be found in any book, notwithstanding the popular opinion that it is a sure symptom of the disease.

Mr. VEST. I supposed that the water test was the one which gave the name to the disease, hydrophobia; that is, hatred of water.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. VEST. This gentleman who died had that aversion to water; but I did not intend to say anything about that. My opinion is worth nothing. I simply state what I saw.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish we could hear the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. VEST. What does the Senator say?

Mr. BERRY. You are not heard on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I ask for order in the Chamber.

Mr. VEST. Without going into the question whether there is such a disease, I will simply say that I saw in the morning papers two days ago a statement that a dog had bitten a little girl here. The dog was immediately killed by a policeman, and under the new practice the carcass of the animal was sent to the Chief Chemist, I think, in the Agricultural Department. He analyzed the carcass and, I think, declared that the dog had rabies. That is my impression, though I may be mistaken. Anyway, he analyzed the carcass and gave an expert opinion as to whether the disease was there or not.

I do not understand that my friend from New Hampshire says there is no such disease, but he says that in thirty years' practice he never saw it. It is a very rare disease, for God in His mercy has made a malady so terrible as that exceedingly rare. If an ordinary disease, it would be the terror and curse of the whole human family.

That leads me to make one statement myself. If there is a possibility of there being such a disease I would muzzle every dog in this country rather than have a single human being suffer from it.

I do not know all of these gentlemen. I know a few of those who signed this petition; but if they think there is a possibility of such a disease, and the experts here know what they are saying about the carcasses of these animals, and yet are willing to keep their fancy dogs, even if they pay $500 or $1,000, as some insane people do, for dogs, I have very little respect for them. I can not conceive a case in which there ought to be any question about muzzling every dog in a town or city or locality where there is any sort of suspicion that this terrible malady exists. I see from the newspapers that they think they have got it here, whether they have or not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is one of the unfortunate things that when an agitation of this kind arises it makes the community think a disease exists that does not exist.

Now, Mr. President, I have not denied and will not deny that there is such a disease as hydrophobia. I say that it is so rare that, in my opinion, it is not worth while discussing it. I picked up a Philadelphia paper yesterday morning and I read of two families and one individual who had been saved from sure destruction by dogs. In two instances the dogs gave the alarm and saved the family from being burned up in their homes, which would have been inevitable had it not been for the faithful dog. In my judgment dogs save a hundred times as many lives as perish from this so-called disease of hydrophobia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask permission to ask the Senator from New Hampshire one question on the subject he has just discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That petition has been referred.

Mr. WARREN. Then I am out of order?

Mr. WOLCOTT and others. No.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator can proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope unanimous consent will be given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will proceed, without objection.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask merely one question. I shall not be tedious. Is there any reason for us to suspect that hydrophobia is more prevalent in the city of Washington than in any other city in the United States or in the world? Is there anything in the climate or atmosphere here to make it more prevalent? In general terms, is there any more reason for the muzzling of dogs three hundred and sixty-five days in the year in Washington than there exists in any other city in the United States?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the only reason is that we have more young scientific gentlemen who want to make reputations for themselves in discovering this disease, which, in my judgment, does not exist. Of course hydrophobia is not more prevalent in Washington than elsewhere.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming, I should like to say to him that in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of most men who have looked into this question, there is no more danger of hydrophobia in Washington than anywhere else.

The trouble with the muzzling order is that owing to our system of organization of this Republic we can not have a uniform muzzling order all over the United States. There has been in England for the last three years the most splendid illustration of the ability of a firm centralized government to stamp out the disease of hydrophobia that has ever been heard of. The home secretary, Mr. Long, entered an order that no dog in the United Kingdom should go without a muzzle and that no person upon any pretext or excuse, on payment of any duties or fines whatever, should be permitted under any circumstances to bring a dog into Great Britain.

Up to that time there had been the death of thousands of cattle. There had been many human beings who died of hydrophobia. He persisted in his order against all the ignorant physicians and mock humanitarians and people who cared more for dogs than for human beings in the United Kingdom, and the agony column of the Times was filled day after day with attacks upon him. But he persisted in his order, with the result that hydrophobia has been absolutely stamped out of Great Britain. Now, in view of that, he has been able to remove the restrictions and permit the unmuzzling of dogs.

Only the other day we were hearing of thousands and thousands of dollars' worth of valuable blooded cattle in the State of New Jersey that were compelled to be killed because dogs with hydrophobia ran with them through certain sections of the State. If this muzzling order could not only be continued here, but extended throughout the United States, it would stamp out this dread disease, and without it, in my opinion, we can not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire simply to say a word further, and that is that I have been delighted to hear this learned medical and scientific exposition from the Senator from Colorado. I believe the Senator has been misinformed. I do not believe a word of it, and I go on record as not believing a word of it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to know whether the Senator speaks as a physician or as a Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, both.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, possibly a little personal experience may not be without its value, even if suggested to the Senator from New Hampshire.

I am not a physician, but I have had some personal experience on this very matter similar to that narrated by the Senator from Colorado. I myself in one season lost seven or eight valuable head of cattle bitten by dogs and that died with every symptom of hydrophobia. Not only that, but in another season I had a very valuable mare that was bitten in the nose by a dog and which undoubtedly died from hydrophobia. Whether it is hydrophobia or not I do not know. Certainly it is a disease which is communicated by the bite of a dog, and the animals die with the symptoms which are generally reputed to be those of hydrophobia. Of course I do not profess to have any scientific knowledge on the subject, but I have had a very serious practical experience in connection with it.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

COURTS IN TEXAS.

Mr. PETTUS. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back a bill simply to change a county in Texas from one judicial district into another district. It involves no cost, and I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 9284) to attach the county of Foard, in the State of Texas, to the Fort Worth division of the northern district of Texas, and providing that all process issued against defendants residing in said county shall be returned to Fort Worth, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. BACON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 60) to create the northwestern division of the northern district of Georgia for judicial purposes and to fix the time and place for holding court therein, to report it without amendment. I will state that I am directed by the committee to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 939) to permit C. R. S. Nichols to make a second homestead entry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on National Health and Public Quarantine, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4047) for the protection of the public health, to report it back. I call the attention of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. FOSTER] to this bill. The bill ought to be referred to the Committee on Manufactures. I understand, not directly from the Senator, but by information, that he desires to have it so referred. However, I report it back with the request that the Committee on National Health and Public Quarantine be discharged from its further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the committee will be discharged, and——

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DEBOE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1364) increasing the pension of Henry H. Blockson, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1897) to amend an act entitled "An act to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, Cal.," reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3284) for the relief of Eugenie Baptiste, sole surviving heir of Francisco Krebs, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. THURSTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3685) to amend the seventh section of the act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, to report it with an amendment. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall have to object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. THURSTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1794) for the relief of Fred Wreddle, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 876) for the relief of John E. Welch, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for grading and improving Joliet street, between the Tunlaw road and Wisconsin avenue, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. SULLIVAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2456) for the relief of the heirs and assignees of Philip McLoskey and John Hagan, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to report upon a schedule to the Senate the readjusted salaries of all postmasters who served in the Territory and State of Wyoming between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, whose names as claimants appear in the Court of Claims in the case entitled Edwin S. Whittier and others vs. The United States, No. 18336, each such salary account to conform in all respects to the order of the Postmaster-General published by circular under date of June 9, 1883, and to the requirement of the act of March 3, 1883, as said requirement was published by the Postmaster-General in the newspapers of the country under date of February 17, 1884, and with such report transmit to the Senate a full copy of the text of the construction by the Postmaster-General of the act of March 3, 1883, embodied in said circular and publication in the newspapers and in circular form No. 1223, the text of each of which, under date of November 8, 1887, was transmitted by the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General for use in the case of Jane Yarrington and others vs. The United States, No. 16345.

IRRIGATION OF PIMA RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to carefully examine and report upon the proposed plans for irrigating the Pima Reservation in Arizona particularly:

First, with reference to the feasibility cost, and comparative merit of such plans;

Second, the extent to which the Indians occupying such reservation have heretofore been furnished irrigation for their lands;

Third, by what means they have been deprived of such irrigation, whether legally or otherwise;

Fourth, whether the irrigation which they have heretofore enjoyed has been in connection with any enterprise for the irrigation of lands belonging to individuals or syndicates;

Fifth. Whether any of the proposed plans for irrigating lands upon the Pima Reservation are exclusively for the benefit of the Indians; if not, whether plans can be devised for supplying water to the Indians upon such reservation independent of and disconnected with the rights of individual or company landowners other than the Indians.

Sixth. Full information as to the claims of the Florence Land Company or other owners of land to the right of water to be supplied to the Indians upon such reservation, and the quantity of lands thus owned.

Seventh. Whether there are unoccupied Government lands which might be irrigated under any of the proposed plans after fully supplying water for the irrigation of such reservation.

Eighth. All facts necessary to inform Congress as to the feasibility of irrigating such Indian reservation with or without furnishing water for the irrigation of private lands, and the probable cost thereof.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. STEWART. I wish to remark in regard to that resolution—I shall not object to its being passed—that on the land above where these Indians are the waters have been absorbed by the people who have settled about Pima in very large communities. The water can not very well be taken from them, and there must be more water furnished to the people above before it reaches the Indians on the reservation below.

While I am opposed to the Government undertaking irrigation schemes, I think, perhaps, that the subject ought to be investigated and suitable contracts made to furnish water for the Indians on this reservation. If the old method they had of furnishing water was resorted to, it would utterly depopulate that whole region. That would be out of the question. There must be provision made for storing a large amount of water above in order to furnish sufficient water for the Indian reservation below for use on their lands.

It may be necessary to appropriate a certain sum to furnish water so as to irrigate these lands for the Indians. The Government has got to provide something. We have appropriated $20,000 for those Indians this year, and we must continue to appropriate, because they are a good lot of Indians, who have been self-supporting for some time. I have visited their homes. They are, on the whole, a very superior class of Indians in every respect, but they have got to be taken care of by the Government. Whether it would be cheaper, taking into consideration the people above them, to build a dam is a question to be determined, for the building of a dam is a pretty expensive work; but there is a magnificent place there for a reservoir, and it would furnish plenty of water.

I am glad the Senator has taken hold of the matter. The information we shall secure in answer to the resolution may be a help in deciding what is the best plan to be pursued in regard to the subject.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not desire to discuss the situation there. This resolution simply calls upon the Secretary of the Interior to furnish such information as will put Congress in possession of all the facts in the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5763) to extend the coal-land laws to the district of Alaska;

A bill (H. R. 6250) extending the time for proof and payment on lands claimed under the desert-land law of the United States by the members of the Colorado Cooperative Colony in southwestern Colorado;

A bill (H. R. 8963) to fix the terms of the district and circuit courts of the western judicial district in the State of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. 9634) to set apart certain lands in the Territory of Arizona to be known as the Petrified Forest National Park.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution to print, in black cloth binding and wrapped for mailing, 5,000 copies of the national banking laws for the use of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further transmitted to the Senate the resolutions of the House on the life and services of the Hon. RICHARD PARKS BLAND, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BLAND.

Mr. COCKRELL. I give notice that to-morrow at 1 o'clock I shall ask the Senate to consider resolutions in regard to the death of the late Representative BLAND.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the friends of my motion to strike out the word "not" from that resolution are ready to vote at this time.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator to let me call up a bill which will not lead to any discussion.

Mr. CHANDLER. What is the bill, may I ask?

Mr. ALLEN. A bill for the relief of Mary A. Swift. It will lead to no debate.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the bill will lead to no debate, I shall not object, but I feel that I ought to object to any other bill after that.

MARY A. SWIFT.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 3476) for the relief of Mary A. Swift.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $12,000 for the relief of Mary A. Swift, widow of the late John F. Swift, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Japan, that amount being the salary allowed by law to the above-named office for one year.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is on the amendment to strike out the word "not" in the pending resolution. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I hope that the question on that motion will not be put to the Senate at this time. I will say to the Senate that a vote can be had upon this matter just as soon as Senators who desire to be heard have concluded what they have to say. I am in receipt of a dispatch from an absent Senator saying that he will be here in the morning and that he desires to be heard on this case.

I will state to the Senate that I trust the appropriation bill now before the Senate will be out of the way, so that I may have the privilege of addressing the Senate on this matter on Wednesday—the day after to-morrow. I therefore ask that the resolution may be laid aside for to-day. I would go on to-morrow, only I am advised that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] desires to ask the Senate to consider resolutions in relation to the death of a distinguished citizen of his State, late a member of the House of Representatives; but on Wednesday I shall be very glad to proceed to the discussion of the case, and then will cooperate with the Senators at any time thereafter possible to be agreed upon for taking the vote.

Mr. CHANDLER. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will return to-day and be here to-morrow. To-morrow I shall ask to have unanimous consent for fixing a day when the vote may be taken upon the resolution.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] says he is not willing to go on to-day, and suggests that the Indian appropriation bill ought to be passed. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] in charge of the bill that he ought to have an opportunity to-day to pass that bill. I am informed that it is not likely to take more than half an hour or an hour, and perhaps not so long as a half hour; and so I do not see why the Senator from Michigan, whose mind and manuscript are full on this subject, should not go on to-day instead of waiting until Wednesday next. Therefore I think the Senate should go on with the Indian appropriation bill, and when that is finished to-day the Senator from Michigan ought to go on with his speech.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] that the Indian appropriation bill will in all probability not occupy more than one hour; certainly it will be finished within the limits of that period.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] who has the Philippine bill in charge is absent, and that matter, being the unfinished business before the Senate, will not be called up to-day. Therefore the whole of this day, under the unanimous-consent agreement, can be given to the consideration of the Quay resolution.

The Senator from Michigan distinctly stated last week that he would speak to-day upon this question. There is no public business before the Senate preventing him from so doing, and unless he stands here and states that he is unprepared or unwilling to do so he can not justify himself before this body for any further delay.

I appeal to the fair-minded spirit of this Senate that this case, which has been prolonged for months when it might have been disposed of early, shall, now that no other business before the Senate interferes with it, be promptly disposed of. I appeal to the Senator from Michigan, with all this day before him, to make his speech and to cooperate in the prompt disposition of the case.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he is entirely in error when he says that I gave notice that I would speak on this case this morning.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me correct the statement he attributes to me, I did not intend to say that he gave notice. I went further than that, and said that the Senator from Michigan practically agreed to speak upon this day.

Mr. BURROWS. I did not so understand the statement of the Senator; but be that as it may, neither my mind nor my manuscript is full upon this case at this time.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator——

Mr. BURROWS. I will ask the Senator to desist for a moment.

Mr. STEWART. I was just about to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to say, as I said before, that I shall be ready, so far as I am concerned, to proceed with the discussion of this question on Wednesday immediately after the close of the routine morning business; and whenever the Senate shall determine to vote, either by unanimous consent or in any other way, it will be entirely agreeable to me. I shall put no obstacle in the way. I want a vote on this question; but I want an opportunity to be heard, and I know of absent Senators, who are not here, who desire to be heard, and, as I said before, to-morrow the Senate will be occupied with another matter. The chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections well knows that that committee will be in consultation to-morrow all day upon a very important question, which will preclude the further consideration of this question, so far as I am concerned, to-morrow. I think there is nothing unreasonable, under the circumstances, in asking that the matter may go over. I trust, as I said before, that the appropriation bill may be gotten out of the way, so that we can proceed on Wednesday.

Mr. STEWART. I regard the request as very unusual and very unreasonable. After having entered into a solemn agreement by unanimous consent to take this case up and go on with it, with the exceptions named in the agreement, and those exceptions not appearing, I do not see that it is reasonable or convenient for any one Senator to persist in making motions for a continuance.

Mr. BURROWS. Does the Senator lose sight of the fact that an appropriation bill is now pending before the Senate and that the Senate is dividing on the yeas and nays?

Mr. STEWART. But I do not lose sight of the fact that the Senator objects to going on this afternoon after the appropriation bill shall have been disposed of, if it shall be disposed of.

Mr. BURROWS. I do, because there would not be time for me to conclude what I desire to say to-day.

Mr. STEWART. That does not make any difference. You agreed——

Mr. BURROWS. It makes a difference with me.

Mr. STEWART. It does not make any difference with you as to the unanimous-consent agreement which was made. You are going to violate it for your convenience, are you?

Mr. BURROWS. The agreement was that the consideration of the case should commence on the 3d of April.

Mr. STEWART. This case was to be proceeded with, exclusive of all other business, with certain exceptions named.

Mr. BURROWS. That is precisely what we are doing and what we have been doing.

Mr. STEWART. And now you propose that it shall be continued for your convenience.

Mr. BURROWS. Not at all.

Mr. STEWART. And not to the exclusion of other business, but for your convenience. That is violating the agreement; and I shall object, when the time comes, to the case being postponed or the agreement being violated.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. President, this matter now pending is a question of high privilege, and I want the Senate to observe that five months of this session have passed; and if the idea of some shall be carried out of shortening the session and concluding it within sixty or seventy days hence, it appears to me unseemly that such a question of high privilege should be from week to week and from month to month postponed in this fashion. It seems to me that Senators must admit that the time has arrived when the case should be brought to a vote. My colleague on the committee [Mr. BURROWS] desires to speak on Wednesday. I suggest to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections that he now ask that a day be fixed during this week for a final vote on this proposition.

There is now on the Calendar another case of like high privilege, and I desire at an early day to call up the West Virginia case. I apprehend that it will take but very little time, because I think there is no occasion in that case for difference, and I have no apprehension of any discussion or delay upon it.

After that will follow another very important case, the Montana case, soon to be decided in committee, which should be disposed of at this session of the Senate. The Calendar will thus have upon it, if this matter remains longer unacted upon, three cases of the highest privilege awaiting their turn after every other order of business. It seems to me the time has come to fix a day for a vote in the Pennsylvania case, and that the best judgment of this Senate should favor an early vote. If it can not be obtained by consent, it should be obtained by a motion here; so that we may see whether or not for a half year this Senate will refuse to vote yea or nay upon the right to a seat in this body of a gentleman whose credentials are already upon our table and whose case for months has been debated before this body.

I suggest to the experienced and skillful Senator who is in charge of this resolution that he should endeavor to have the Senator from Michigan to make his argument on Wednesday, and that thereafter on that day or the next day the vote should be pressed, and no longer should delay be consented to in this important matter, so that the other questions as to seats here may follow in their order and be voted upon.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the pending resolution may be voted on on Saturday of this week, at 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending resolution and any amendment at the time pending shall be voted on at 3 o'clock next Saturday afternoon. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not wish to agree to that. I do not like the way this case has been proceeded with; and if I may be permitted to make a single remark, in saying why I object, I will say I do not think it has been wise to take up the resolution and consider it for a little while, one Senator making a speech, and then lay it down until some other Senator was ready to make a speech. I do not wish to speak on measures considered in that way. I do not know whether I desire to speak on the Quay case or not, but if I do, I want it taken up for consideration and have the Senate go on with it, and I desire to say what I wish to say in the way of debating this question. I think we might get a vote before Saturday; but I do not wish to-day, after the methods which have characterized the consideration of this case, to agree to any time for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a remark, I believe the business of the Senate would be facilitated by taking the vote on the pending resolution in regard to the Pennsylvania case; but it seems that it can not be done this week. If it can be done at any reasonable time in the future, I think that the business of the Senate could be proceeded with to greater advantage both to the public and to the Senate itself. I would suggest, if the time can not be fixed now, that we fix a later time than that suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, so as to give every member of the Senate who desires to speak upon the case a chance to speak, and then the case can not be injected into our business constantly. I think that those who are favorable to the seating of Mr. Quay, as well as those who are opposed to it, will see the fairness of this suggestion.

I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire, if the time he named is not agreeable, to try a date later on. I would suggest two weeks from to-day, although perhaps it would seem that I am interfering with a matter which does not particularly concern me.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I wish to say just one word in reply to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], who says he does not like the way this case has been dealt with. The fault is certainly not with those who are in favor of seating Senator Quay. There seems to be an anomalous kind of unanimous-consent agreement here, which provides in the first clause for continuous consideration of this case; and, of course, that means continuous debate, just such as the Senator from Connecticut wishes; but somehow or other, while those who are in favor of seating Mr. Quay are willing to vote without debate, those who are opposed to seating Mr. Quay—and among them is the Senator from Connecticut—do not give any debate by making speeches; they are not ready; but we are ready for a vote. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut how he proposes to bring about the sort of debate upon the resolution which he thinks would be orderly and preferable, which I conceive is provided for by this continuous-consideration agreement, if it is to bind the Senate?

Now, Mr. President, I will ask, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], that unanimous consent be given for a vote upon the resolution two weeks from to-day at four o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that Tuesday would be a little better day than Monday, because Senators who may leave at the end of the week may not get back until Tuesday.

Mr. CHANDLER. Suggestions are again made to me from three sources, and I will name two weeks from to-morrow at 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that a vote be taken on the pending resolution two weeks from to-morrow at 4 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I am not going to interpose an objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, but I do wish to make some remarks with relation to unanimous-consent agreements. I said in the Senate at one time that I would never consent to a unanimous-consent agreement of this sort hereafter in any case in which I felt an interest. No agreement of this sort is ever made but that when it comes to a vote it is misinterpreted and some one suffers by it. I have suffered by these unanimous agreements in a way which to me seemed serious. I do not know that I care to say anything on this case, but if I make any remarks upon it I wish to speak when the case is really under consideration.

I have not postponed or put any obstacle in the way of the consideration of this case. I do not propose to; but I do wish to enter my protest against a pro forma and nominal consideration of a case of this sort where a Senator comes and makes a speech to which no one listens, and where there is no real consideration. I think it ought to be taken up and proceeded with until it is disposed of. I think that vastly better than to make a unanimous-consent agreement about when we will take a vote. If we make an agreement as to when we shall take a vote, we shall never have any real, serious debate on this case. A Senator will come in here some morning, and having given notice, will deliver an essay on the subject, to which no one will pay any attention. I hope those in charge of the case, if this agreement is to be made, will some time within the next fortnight bring forward the case for actual consideration, discussion, and debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I desire to say only this: I am embarrassed somewhat by a dispatch which I have received from an absent Senator, who says in his dispatch that he will be here to-morrow morning and desires that no time shall be fixed for a vote. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire, if it will not make any difference, if he will wait until to-morrow morning, and then we will be able to determine it. For myself, I have no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into, I think it should be stated that fixing a time to vote permits any of the motions which would be in order upon the case to be acted upon—that is, a motion to postpone indefinitely, or to postpone to a fixed time, or any of the ordinary parliamentary motions which would be permissible if the agreement had not been made.

Mr. GALLINGER. All subsidiary motions.

Mr. ALDRICH. All subsidiary motions which would be in order under ordinary circumstances. Otherwise we should be in the position we were in once in this Chamber, as I remember, when we could vote upon nothing but the passage of the resolution itself. I suppose that will be understood if the agreement is made.

I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that no absent Senator, it seems to me, could expect to have this matter postponed to a very much greater extent than it has been, and I can not help thinking that the Senate is doing justice to itself and to the claimant to the seat by fixing a time. I think certainly that a sufficient amount of delay has intervened to enable every Senator to express his opinions upon this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Michigan to object?

Mr. BURROWS. Well, as I said, I am embarrassed by the request that came to me this morning by wire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan object?

Mr. BURROWS. I think I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire to wait until to-morrow morning, simply as a courtesy to an absent Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan objects.

Mr. BURROWS. I think then the agreement can be made.

Mr. BERRY. I should like to ask if the Indian appropriation bill is to be proceeded with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not able to inform the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to be informed when the Indian appropriation bill does come before the Senate. I do not know whether it is the unfinished business or not.

Mr. PENROSE. Do I understand the Senator from Michigan to object to the request for unanimous consent to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Michigan to object.

Mr. BURROWS. I stated that I would ask that the matter be laid over until to-morrow, as a matter of courtesy to an absent Senator. That was all.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he has any objection to mentioning the name of the absent Senator.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask the Secretary to read from the RECORD the statement of the Senator from Michigan in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire regarding his intention to speak to-day upon this case.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I inquire what is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution touching the seating of the Senator from Pennsylvania is before the Senate.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. PENROSE. I have asked for the reading of a statement from the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, although I dislike very much, in view of the dispatch I have received, to consent to this arrangement, yet I am so anxious that this matter shall be brought to a conclusion that I am tempted to forego what I otherwise ought to do—insist upon waiting until to-morrow, and to say that I will agree, so far as I am concerned, that a vote shall be taken two weeks from to-morrow, with the understanding, as stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, that all motions which are ordinarily in order upon a resolution shall be in order at that time.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I did not understand the conclusion of the Senator from Michigan, but two weeks from to-morrow is two weeks away, and I can see no objection, as a matter of courtesy to any absent Senator who does not want a unanimous-consent agreement made for a vote in his absence, why it should not lie over until to-morrow, when he can be here, without any regard to who that Senator may be. If the Senate is willing to-morrow or day after to-morrow to agree to a unanimous-consent agreement to take a vote two weeks from to-morrow, or two weeks from day after to-morrow, the matter will not be delayed one hour by simply postponing the making of the unanimous-consent agreement until the other Senator can be present; and if no Senator will object under the circumstances, I will.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. STEWART. I do not want it understood that this debate goes over until to-morrow by any consent, because I do not want the unanimous-consent agreement to be waived by the person in charge of the case. It has to give way to the Indian appropriation bill, of course, under the consent agreement. When the Indian appropriation bill is disposed of I hope this resolution will be called up and continued, according to the consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is now before the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the reading from the RECORD which I sent to the desk of the statement of the intention of the Senator from Michigan to proceed in this case to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appropriation bill is not before the Senate.

Mr. THURSTON. I understand that. I ask that the resolution concerning Mr. Quay be informally laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object to that if anyone is ready to speak on the Pennsylvania resolution. I had supposed some Senator would be ready to speak after the notice which I gave the other day, and that Senators who intended to speak might properly be asked to be ready and not to longer delay the Senate in the consideration of this resolution. I will ask the Senator from Michigan if he is ready to proceed this morning?

Mr. BURROWS. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I am not, and I do not know of anyone who is prepared this morning to proceed. We shall be ready next week, probably on Monday, to go on with the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan not only stated that he would himself be prepared to speak to-day upon this case, but he also declared, and so did the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], that there were probably ten or twelve Senators who desired to be heard on the other side of this question. I have already referred to the fact that the Indian appropriation bill will hardly occupy an hour. I ask the Senator from Michigan, if he is unable to keep his agreement to go on to-day himself, whether any of the ten or twelve gentlemen to whom he referred are present in the Chamber and ready to proceed.

Mr. BURROWS. It is hardly necessary for me to reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania that I made no such agreement as that to which he alludes. I expressed the hope that probably I should be able to proceed at this time. That is all the answer I desire to make.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the Senator what has become of his ten or twelve orators?

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator will hear them in due time.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to hear them.

Mr. FORAKER. I have been absent from the Chamber two or three days, unavoidably, and have just returned. I gather what is under consideration. I rise to inquire what is the objection, if this resolution is under consideration, to voting now, if there is no one here who wishes to speak in opposition? Every time this matter comes up it is to be voted on at some indefinite time in the future, and we have never yet been able to agree upon a day. I do not understand why we should be continually occupying the attention of the Senate with agreements that are unnecessary, it seems to me, if we proceed in due order with the consideration of this matter to its disposition. I am prepared to vote upon it now, and if there is no Senator who wishes to speak in opposition or who desires to speak in favor of it, I do not see why we should not take a vote now and dispose of it.

Mr. BURROWS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand this is the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to strike out the word "not."

Mr. BURROWS. I understood there was an understanding that this case should be voted upon two weeks from to-morrow. That was the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection was made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BURROWS. I did not understand that. Then I repeat to the Senate that I desire to be heard in this case, as I know other Senators do, and that I shall be ready to speak day after to-morrow; and if the Senate thinks it is courteous and proper to push this case to a vote now, without further discussion, of course I shall have to submit, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. STEWART. Undoubtedly it would be highly proper. It is the unanimous understanding, and I am opposed to the idea that it would be proper, under the unanimous-consent understanding, to give a man several more months to get ready to make a speech when he is ready with his speech always on all other occasions and waive the unanimous-consent agreement. I want to vote upon the case according to the unanimous-consent agreement, if there is nobody ready to speak.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a House bill for reference.

Mr. PENROSE. Do I understand that the Quay resolution is before the Senate?

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to say before this matter is passed that I did not understand that the Senator from Michigan had given notice that he wanted at any particular time to make a speech on this subject.

Mr. BURROWS. I stated that I desired——

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator at times stated that he contemplated making a speech on this subject and at other times that he had some doubts in his own mind whether or not he would speak. I was of the impression that now he did not intend to speak.

Mr. BURROWS. I stated——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Michigan allow me to conclude?

Mr. BURROWS. I stated, before the Senator from Ohio came in, that I desired to make some remarks on this case and would do so Wednesday morning, as to-morrow is to be occupied with another matter.

Mr. PENROSE. Before the Pennsylvania resolution goes over until to-morrow, I desire to have a distinct understanding as to what is the present purpose of the Senator from Michigan. I thought I knew it last week, and I have had the RECORD read reciting his statement. It appears that I was wrong, and most of the Senate was wrong, and the public press was wrong as to the character of his intention. I understand now that he is ready and determined to proceed on Wednesday next, that he has some ten or twelve gentlemen who desire to be heard on behalf of the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that at the request of a Senator, unknown to this body, he desires the case to go over until to-morrow. If I am wrong in my understanding of the present status of the matter, I trust that the Senator from Michigan will relieve me of my error.

Mr. BURROWS. I will correct the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will allow me.

Mr. PENROSE. I shall be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. BURROWS. I have already consented that a final vote shall be taken upon this matter and that it shall be concluded two weeks from to-morrow. I do not object. As to the ten or twelve gentlemen who desire to speak, I have the list of Senators—not that I have secured them to speak, but they are Senators who have expressed to me a desire to be heard; and they will be heard in due time, if they have the opportunity.

Mr. STEWART. There is no consent to put the case over two weeks from to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is reason in all things. I think under the circumstances this case had better go over until to-morrow, in view of the objection made by the Senator from Arkansas; and when the resolution comes up after the routine business to-morrow morning, I shall ask that two weeks from to-morrow at 4 o'clock in the afternoon the subject may be disposed of by a vote of the Senate, without further debate, and I shall expect that that request will meet with unanimous consent. I do not think it is worth while to undertake, after the Senator from Nebraska finishes with the Indian appropriation bill, to force anyone to discuss the subject to-day. If there is anyone ready to go on to-morrow, he will proceed; the Senator from Michigan will speak on Wednesday, and I humbly entreat the Senator from Nevada, whose zeal in behalf of the same cause that I have espoused is great, to allow this disposition to be made of the case to-day.

Mr. BURROWS. That statement is entirely satisfactory to me.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

A bill (H. R. 5763) to extend the coal-land laws to the district of Alaska;

A bill (H. R. 6250) extending the time for proof and payment on lands claimed under the desert-land law of the United States by the members of the Colorado Cooperative Colony in southwestern Colorado; and

A bill (H. R. 9634) to set apart certain lands in the Territory of Arizona to be known as The Petrified Forest National Park.

The bill (H. R. 8963) to fix the terms of the district and circuit courts of the western judicial district in the State of Louisiana was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed, in black cloth binding and wrapped for mailing, 5,000 copies of the national banking laws, for the use of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. THURSTON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the yeas and nays were ordered, but there being no quorem present, I presume the amendment is still open to debate. It is pending with the yeas and nays ordered upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks that upon demand the yeas and nays having been ordered and partially completed, they must be completed.

Mr. BERRY. There having been no quorum present, I suggest that the vote was not taken and could not be said to have been taken. It stands now that the yeas and nays are ordered as though no vote had been attempted. It is certainly open to debate. That has always been the rule here. That is my understanding of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas is recognized.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I wish to make a few remarks in regard to the pending amendment. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment offered by my colleague.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of line 14, on page 54, the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, but shall only make such contracts at places where the Government has not provided school facilities for all the children of school age residing thereat, and to an extent not exceeding the number of children in attendance at said contract schools at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire to say that in all matters pertaining to Indian affairs, of which committee my colleague is a member and I am not, it has always been my pleasure to take his judgment on questions arising about which there was any doubt and with which he was unquestionably more familiar than I could be. But this particular question has been before the Senate so long and has been so often discussed that every Senator upon this floor has had an equal opportunity to determine as to its merits.

Now, as has already been stated on this floor, some six years ago strong opposition arose to contract schools. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] stated Saturday that that was due and attributable to the prejudice against the Catholic Church, which church was teaching most of these Indians. I think a large part of that opposition is probably due to the cause to which he ascribes it, but it was not due wholly to that. There were a great many American citizens who have no prejudice against any church who oppose any legislation that tends to violate the principle upon which this Government is founded, that church and state should always be kept separate and that no aid should be granted to any particular denomination, and who believed that this legislation, having that tendency, ought to cease.

The House of Representatives was opposed to these contract schools. They came here, and the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses realized that if such schools were abolished at once, there would probably be a number of Indian children who would be left without school facilities, and realizing that it was impossible to get the House to agree to continue the appropriation for contract schools, schools taught by the churches, unless there was an understanding, they made an agreement that these appropriations for contract schools should be decreased 20 per cent per year. It was no secret agreement made by these two committees. It was stated upon the floor of the Senate. It was stated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL]. It was agreed that at the end of that time the Interior Department would provide for the education of these children by the Government, and thereafter there would be no appropriation for contract schools. But for that agreement the House of Representatives would never have consented to continue the appropriation for the five or six years past.

It was stated, if I remember correctly, that the time expired one year ago; and while the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior stated then that they were able to make provision for these children, yet there were Senators on this floor who doubted it and believed that some of them would be left without such facilities. They asked that one year more be given, notwithstanding this agreement, and the House of Representatives were reluctant, but agreed to it. They said if it was put in the law that after that no such appropriation should be made, so that there could be no misunderstanding hereafter, they would consent to it. It was put into the law.

I assert that these appropriations for the last four years never could have passed both Houses but for this agreement. I assert that the Committee on Appropriations, of which I was a member, secured votes to continue that here by stating that this agreement had been made. It otherwise never would have been done. I submit whether it is good faith and in keeping with that agreement, stated publicly in the Senate, to again insist at this time on further appropriations for these contract schools.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BERRY. I yield.

Mr. VEST. Probably I am anticipating what the Senator is about to say, but I wish to ask him a question. Does he think any agreement made in a former Congress or at a former session should bind the Senate or the Congress of the United States if an unforeseen emergency should arise for different legislation. If I am incorrect I want to know it, but I understand by the statement of the Senator's colleague and other Senators that while this agreement was unquestionably made and a year added to the five years, there are now for some reason, and I do not care to discuss that, 2,600 Indian children who are not provided with any means of education at all for the next fiscal year. Is it in violation of any agreement heretofore made if we provide for this emergency; or shall we, because of an agreement having been made, the facts having changed and an emergency arisen, call it a breach of faith because we legislate? I would not violate any agreement, but I do not understand that we are violating it.

Mr. BERRY. I understand as well as the Senator from Missouri that one Congress can not bind another, and I understand that we can, if we desire to do it, violate any agreement. We can violate the agreement we made with the Cubans or rather disregard the promise we made to give them a free and independent government; but I do not think we could be justified in our minds or retain the respect of mankind if we did it.

In regard to the remainder of his question, I have heard it stated—the Senator from Nebraska stated it on the floor Saturday—that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had stated before the committee that they could provide for these children and that none would be left without school facilities; and I know that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs made that statement one year ago. Yet Senators said he did not know what he was talking about, and that he could not do it, but if they had one year, then there could be no doubt about it. We gave them that year. He says he can do it. Whether he can or not I do not know.

Mr. VEST. If my friend will permit me, I think it only fair that he should state also what is the fact, as I am informed by members of the Indian Affairs Committee, that what the Commissioner means by providing for these children is by taking them three or four or five hundred miles from their reservations to other schools.

Mr. BERRY. I did not so understand it.

Mr. VEST. The Senator's colleague can state.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. He stated that he could take care of them by removing them to other places.

Mr. BERRY. Not specifying three or four hundred miles.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. He did not say anything about the distance, but removing them from their own reservations.

Mr. BERRY. The agreement may not be binding on others, but I was a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and the committee realized that the House did not want to make an appropriation for these contract schools five years ago, and a majority of the committee and the Senate agreed with the House. It was because it was said, and repeatedly said, in the Senate that these children would be left without educational facilities that they finally consented to this arrangement which was made upon the floor of the Senate. There may be Senators who were not then Senators who may not feel that it is binding upon them. So far as I am concerned individually—I question no man's right to vote in any other way—I would feel, after what I have said in order to get this matter finally arranged, that I was guilty of bad faith and of failing to keep the agreement I made if I did not oppose this amendment. I do not say that that applies to my colleague or to the Senator from Missouri, but it would apply to me.

My colleague stated that this amendment did not make an appropriation. That is true; but the bill makes appropriations, and the amendment provides that the Secretary of the Interior may use the money to continue these contract schools, and it seems to me that is as much a violation of the spirit of the agreement as though the appropriation was made direct.

I can see no difference in it to my mind. As I said a while ago, it is not at all pleasant for me to vote against an amendment in regard to Indian affairs proposed by my colleague, as I am always delighted to follow his judgment in such matters because of his superior information as to Indian affairs; but I do believe that after that agreement by which we got an extension one year ago and put it in the law, then for the Senate to seek to put on the House bill an amendment which is in violation of either the letter or the spirit is not treating the House of Representatives fairly, and it is unjust to those Senators who voted for the bill before and who would not have voted for it but for that agreement.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, what troubles me with regard to this matter is how we are to keep our agreement. It was based on the idea that preparations were to be made by the Government to take care of these children. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, or of anyone who may know, whether any recommendation has been made by the Department or any action taken in the estimates for the Indian service for buildings in which to take care of these schools.

Mr. THURSTON. I stated very fully on Saturday, and what I stated is in the RECORD, if the Senator had been present or had read the RECORD, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs says that he has school facilities adequate to take care of Indian children for the ensuing year without providing for any of them in contract schools. He also has full authority to buy any of the buildings. His appropriation is sufficient to buy any of the buildings now used for contract schools. He has been ready at all times to buy those buildings. He has bought two or three of them already.

But the fact remains that the school buildings are not for sale. The fact further remains, Mr. President, as a practical question, as I stated fully on Saturday last, that the church using these schools in pursuance of a great and good and beneficent purpose do not propose to give up their schools and do not propose to turn the Indian scholars out; and as a practical question the scholars now educated at the expense of the Government in the Indian schools, whether we pass this amendment or not, will be educated there another year, and another year, and another year, and will not be turned back to the care and custody of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. In case the Government should erect buildings at the localities where these Indians live and offer to take them, does the Senator still believe that the children would be retained in the Catholic schools, where they are now?

Mr. THURSTON. I do. That has been in substance the statement of the representatives of these schools as far as they have been heard from.

Mr. STEWART. Then erecting buildings at those localities would be useless, because the Government could not get the scholars.

Mr. THURSTON. In my judgment, yes; at the present time. The Catholic Church, Mr. President, has been engaged for many years in a great missionary enterprise among the Indians. I believe in it myself. I believe they have done a wonderful and a splendid work, and they have large mission schools now in different parts of the country where they are educating Indian children. In those schools they have never asked one cent from the Government of the United States to assist them. They have also had these schools on the reservations that are called contract schools, where we have paid for the education of the Indians. But in my judgment it is the settled purpose of that church, and I am glad of it, to continue their great scheme of education of the Indian children both at the missions and in the schools on the reservations, whether the Government provides the expenses or not.

Mr. STEWART. I concur with the Senator from Nebraska that they have done a great work. I have visited many of their schools, and the church is organized to do the work. No other church appears to have the facilities. Others can not get the teachers and have not the organization to carry it on. The Catholics have done a great work not only in the United States, but on the Western Hemisphere. They have their faults, and all that, but on the Western Hemisphere they have made a great many millions of Indians citizens of the countries where they live and have vastly improved their condition.

Take Mexico. Nine-tenths and perhaps more of the people of Mexico are Indians that have been civilized mostly through the agencies of the Catholic Church, and that is the case in all South America. They have done a great work. Abuses grow up in that church as in all others. There were many abuses when Diaz became President. He took hold of the work with a strong hand and remedied the abuses. That created great friction for the time being, but I believe the church now recognize that he was a real reformer, and they are in favor of his remaining in office.

That church is like all other churches. It is like human nature. It must come in contact with opposition. There must be competition in everything in civilization to make it reach its highest perfection. I think all the churches of the United States have reached a higher plane on account of the freedom of religion than they would otherwise occupy. Where all can worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences and each is emulating the other, it raises them to a higher plane. Where there is diversity of opinion, where they discuss questions freely, zealous men and women on all sides always raise religion to a higher plane than where it is left confined to one church, no matter what church it may be.

In the United States all churches, I believe, on an average, are of a higher grade than in any other country in the world, owing to our free institutions. The Catholic Church in the United States, in dealing with the Indians in their education, can hardly be criticised. I have seen its work, and anybody who follows it up will approve of it, I think. But the other churches, the people at large, do not think that the Government ought to get entangled with any church, and for that reason this law has been passed. I do not think many Senators who voted for it voted for it at all upon the ground that the Catholic Church was not doing its duty and doing a great work with the Indians, but on the ground that the Government ought not to patronize any particular church under our system of government; that it might lead to abuses. That, I think, was the only reason for changing the system. It was determined to change the system, and that is going to be done now by the decision of both Houses of Congress. I do not know but that this is as good a time as any, and under the circumstances I shall vote to sustain the committee.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. My colleague [Mr. BERRY], a few minutes ago, in giving the reason why he was not willing to vote for this amendment, stated that it was agreed a year ago, in the Appropriations Committee, perhaps, that that should be the last appropriation for contract schools and that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs would have sufficient accommodations for the schools the next fiscal year.

Now, if that agreement was made it was twofold: It stipulated, first, that we would make no more appropriations for contract schools, and, second, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs would have sufficient accommodations for the school children. If he has sufficient accommodations for the school children, then this amendment proposed by me can do no possible harm, because there is not one word in the amendment directing that he shall do anything, but it simply gives him permission, if it is necessary and these children can not be taken care of in Government schools, that he may then have them taken care of in contract schools.

If we must break the agreement that my colleague thinks was made a year ago, the question is, Would it be better for us to break it in the matter of disappointing the children or in the matter of using some money to have the children educated in contract schools? That is all.

The Secretary of the Interior, if this agreement is adopted, will not be required to put one single Indian child in a contract school. There is not one word in this proposed amendment making an appropriation of one dollar nor one cent for any such purpose. It simply leaves the discretion in the Secretary of the Interior, if he finds that these children can not be taken care of on the reservation, where they ought to be, that instead of having them without school facilities during the next year he may make provision for them in the contract schools. During that year he may, if he sees fit to do so, have necessary buildings put up—necessary schools provided.

This amendment will apply only to a single year. It does not propose to return to the contract-school system, but simply provides that for the time being, when there is no other means of educating the Indian children, he may have them taken care of by making contracts with schools on the outside. This is all the amendment proposes to do; and it seems to me there can be no objection to it by the most bitter opponent of the contract-school system.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, there has been considerable discussion about an agreement, and I think it is proper that I should say something in that connection.

I had charge of the Indian appropriation bill, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, for four years during the time when these reductions were being made for the contract schools, and, as far as I am concerned, there was no agreement whatever and no understanding that this appropriation should cease at the end of any definite period. On the contrary, an amendment was placed on the bill by the Committee on Appropriations providing for these contract schools, and in the Senate the opponents of the appropriation contested it at every session bitterly and undertook to defeat the appropriation. If there had been an understanding, certainly they would not have taken this position. If there had been an agreement and they understood there was such an agreement, they would not have opposed the appropriation, but would have insisted that the agreement should be carried out.

The fact of the matter is that there was no agreement. The appropriations were decreased year by year, and during the time I had charge of the bill, although it was a Senate amendment, there never was any understanding in conference between this body and the other House on the subject. What may have been done last year I do not know, but I do know that I stated on this floor publicly that I would abide by no understanding, and if it was understood that an agreement was to be made that I should call up the matter again this year, unless sufficient facilities were furnished to take care of these Indian children.

Now, the facilities have not been furnished in the State of South Dakota. I know there are several hundred Indian children that the Government has not the facilities to take care of. The Government may have schools somewhere else outside of the State of South Dakota, but I do not think it is right and just that those children should be taken beyond the borders of the State. There are three schools, one with 140 children, another with 210 children, and another with over 40 children, that are supported by the Catholic Church. We provide a fund amounting to $108 per capita for a portion of those children in the schools; about 200, I think, in the three schools.

Now, I do not know where they are going to put those children if they are not to be educated in those schools, and therefore I believe the Government ought to provide for continuing them there. If they are removed to a Government school it will cost us $167 apiece for each one of the children where now it costs us but $108; and in addition to that we must furnish fuel and lights and the buildings and take care of the buildings, while when the Catholics take care of the children they furnish all this for $108. I believe it is greater economy and better for the children that their education should be finished in the schools where they are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. THURSTON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that order will be made. The Senator from South Dakota will proceed.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BATE. Let the amendment be read, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 14, page 54, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may make contracts with present contract schools for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, but shall only make such contracts at places where the Government has not provided school facilities for all the children of school age residing thereat, and to an extent not exceeding the number of children in attendance at said contract schools at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called on agreeing to the amendment which has just been read.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut (when Mr. KYLE's name was called). The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] has been called home suddenly. He is paired on this question with the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. QUARLES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. THURSTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I do not observe him in the Chamber. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Why not transfer your pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]?

Mr. THURSTON. Acting on the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticutt, I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. WELLINGTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask if the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the junior Senator from Kansas has not voted.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I withhold my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. QUARLES. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SPOONER] is absent from the city by reason of sickness in his family.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire to state on behalf of my colleague [Mr. ELKINS] that he is paired with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], and I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. A transfer of those pairs enables both the Senator from Montana and myself to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK of Montana. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], but under the arrangement stated by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN], I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TURLEY. I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], as I announced on the previous vote. He is absent, and I therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CLAY (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to ask if the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the junior Senator from Massachusetts has not voted.

Mr. CLAY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts and therefore withdraw my vote. Were he present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. He stands paired on this vote, as has been stated, with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. BACON. I understand the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. WETMORE] has not voted. If I am correct in that, I withhold my vote, as I have a general pair with him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the junior Senator from Rhode Island has not voted.

Mr. TURLEY. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. QUARLES] is paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and with his consent I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], so that we can vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. QUARLES. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Bate,	Hansbrough,	McLaurin,	Pettigrew,
Carter,	Heitfeld,	Martin,	Taliaferro,

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of Arkansas was rejected.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. THURSTON. There are three or four amendments that I think will lead to no debate, which I desire to offer at the request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I prefer to offer those at this time if the other amendments can wait a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska to complete the committee amendments.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There was an amendment adopted on my motion on Saturday last in which I made a mistake in the date, which I should like to correct. On page 39 I offered an amendment, and where the words "December sixteenth" are inserted the intention was to make it "December fifth and ninth," striking out the word "sixteenth" and inserting "fifth and ninth," so as to read "December fifth and ninth, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the correction? The Chair hears none, and it will be made.

Mr. THURSTON. At the request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whose letter on the subject I ask leave to print in the RECORD, I submit an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be printed in the RECORD, without objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 7, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to an important omission in the Indian bill. The following clause should go in on page 70, after the word "provision," line 31:

"Provided, That so much of the appropriations herein made as may be required to pay for goods and supplies, for expenses incident to their purchase, and for transportation of the same, for the year ending June 30, 1901, shall be immediately available, but no such goods or supplies shall be distributed or delivered to any of said Indians prior to July 1, 1900."

This clause has been in every Indian bill for many years, except that for 1900, in which I see that it is omitted; probably an oversight. It is very important that it should go in. The office is about to open bids and make contracts for Indian goods and supplies for next year; and it is necessary to start some of the goods forward prior to June 30, so they may be on hand in time for issue on July 1.

Very respectfully,

W A. JONES,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN M. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment presented by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

Provided, That so much of the appropriation herein made as may be required to pay for goods and supplies, for expenses incident to their purchase, and for transportation of the same, for the year ending June 30, 1901, shall be immediately available, but no such goods or supplies shall be distributed or delivered to any of said Indians prior to July 1, 1900.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURSTON. On Friday last an amendment was adopted after line 10, on page 54. I move to amend that amendment as adopted by adding, after the words "Tuba City," the following: "or so much thereof as may be required."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after the words "Tuba City," in the third line from the bottom of the amendment, the words "or so much thereof as may be required."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURSTON. At the request of the Secretary of the Interior, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Following the amendment on page 54, after line 10, it is proposed to insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for the procurement of timber and stone for such domestic and industrial purposes, to be used only in the Indian Territory, as in his judgment he shall deem necessary and proper, from lands belonging to either of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and to fix the rates of royalty to be paid therefor, and collect the same for the benefit of said tribes; and every person who unlawfully cuts, or aids, or is employed in unlawfully cutting, or wantonly destroys, or procures to be wantonly destroyed, any timber standing upon the land of either of said tribes, contrary to the regulations prescribed by the Secretary, shall pay a fine of not more than $500, or be imprisoned not more than twelve months, or both, in the discretion of the court trying the same.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I make the point of order against the amendment that it is general legislation and entirely out of order.

Mr. THURSTON. I admit that the amendment is subject to the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. THURSTON. In connection with the presentation of the amendment, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, I ask to have his letter inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, April 5, 1900.
CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

SIR: The act of Congress approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stat., 495), contains no specific authority for the Secretary of the Interior to make regulations relative to the procurement and use of timber in the Indian Territory for domestic and industrial purposes, and, in my judgment, it is specially desirable that statutory authority be given the Secretary to make appropriate regulations so that such timber can be obtained as may be necessary for domestic use and the industrial development of the Indian Territory, and to be used only therein. The Secretary should be authorized to fix the rates of royalty to be collected under his direction for the benefit of the several tribes, and the law should also prescribe the penalty to be enforced against any person securing timber contrary to said regulations.

I have therefore to recommend that an amendment be incorporated, if deemed practicable, in the Indian appropriation bill [H. R. 7433], as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to prescribe rules and regulations for the procurement of timber and stone for such domestic and industrial purposes, to be used only in the Indian Territory, as in his judgment he shall deem necessary and proper, from lands belonging to either of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and to fix the rates of royalty to be paid therefore and collect the same for the benefit of said tribes; and every person who unlawfully cuts, or aids, or is employed in unlawfully cutting, or wantonly destroys, or procures to be wantonly destroyed, any timber standing upon the land of either of said tribes, contrary to the regulations prescribed by the Secretary, shall pay a fine of not more than $500, or be imprisoned not more than twelve months, or both, in the discretion of the court trying the same."

A draft of said amendment is inclosed herewith.

Respectfully,

E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

Mr. THURSTON. At the suggestion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, line 15, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That of this amount $3,116.25 may be used to reimburse Maj. R. H. Pratt for amount expended by him in the purchase of band instruments for the use of said school in 1898.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know what excuse there is for that amendment?

Mr. THURSTON. In that connection I will read the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who says:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, April 7, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a bill of C. G. Conn, against Capt. R. H. Pratt, for band instruments furnished him in 1898, amounting to $3,116.25.

These instruments were obtained with a view of equipping Carlisle band for the Paris Exposition, and were paid for by contributions by private parties, the idea being that the band could give concerts in some cities and with the proceeds reimburse the contributors. Unfortunately this has proved a failure, and Major Pratt is confined at the school by sickness and unable to carry out his original plans. He is consequently embarrassed, and wishes that the instruments described should be paid for out of Government money, of which there will be enough in his next year's appropriation without adding anything thereto.

The band instruments at Carlisle, so far, have not cost the Government a dollar, having been contributed by private parties. At other schools in the service the Government furnishes instruments, and there seems no good reason why it should not be so at Carlisle. I am therefore of the decided opinion that the amendment which I handed you yesterday should go in the Indian bill. As has been said, it does not increase the appropriation for Carlisle School at all.

Very respectfully,

W. A. JONES,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN M. THURSTON,
Chairman Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object to any settlement of a claim in this way, and I object to the amendment. It seems to me it is subject to the point of order. It is clearly a claim on an appropriation bill; and besides, it is a claim not well founded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota make the point of order on the amendment?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, on Friday last the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] proposed an amendment on page 37, which at the time seemed to be unnecessary. In the present bill, by amendment already adopted, we have retained the agent at the Nez Perce Agency in Colorado. The provision of the bill on page 37, "for support and civilization of Nez Perce Indians in Idaho, including pay of physician, $1,000," was limited to that amount upon the theory that the agency was to be discontinued. Having continued the agency, it is necessary, as shown by the telegraphic correspondence between the Senator from Idaho and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to increase that appropriation. I therefore move that the word "one," after the word "physician," in line 7, on page 37, be stricken out and the word "three" inserted. That will allow $3,000 instead of $1,000 for the support and civilization of the Nez Perce Indians in Idaho.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURSTON. In that connection, I will ask that the correspondence in relation to that amendment be embodied in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be printed in the RECORD if there be no objection.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

APRIL 7, 1900.

To COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Is there any general appropriation from which employees at Nez Perces Indian Agency, Idaho, can be paid if not specially appropriated for? See line 6, page 37, Indian appropriation bill. No employees provided for there except physician. If there is no general fund from which such employees can be paid, what amount should be appropriated in Indian appropriation bill, which will pass the Senate within an hour or so? Early response requested.

GEO. L. SHOUP.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1900.

Hon. GEORGE L. SHOUP, United States Senate:

There is no general appropriation from which agency employees can be paid if not specially appropriated for. Only appropriation from which Nez Perces Agency employees can be paid next year, if amount on page 19 was omitted, are page 37, line 6, and on page 43, line 11. Salaries of agency employees present year aggregate $7,260. If agency is to be continued, it will require at least $3,000 to run it any way efficient.

W. A. JONES, Commissioner.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I believe that completes all the committee amendments, and all that I have been asked to offer by the Department.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on line 10, page 6 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 10, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

For additional payment for the last three quarters of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, $750.

Mr. THURSTON. What is the proposed amendment?

Mr. WARREN. The proposition is to add $750 to the payment of the agent at the Union Agency for the last three quarters of the present fiscal year.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, that matter was before the committee; and my recollection now is that we reached the conclusion that the compensation of that agent should be increased to $2,500 per year and that the general opinion in the committee was that it would only be fair to have that same compensation cover a portion of the present fiscal year. So far as I am concerned, I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will ask to have printed some correspondence of the Department regarding this matter; also part of a letter from Agent J. Blair Shoenfelt.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correspondence referred to by the Senator will be printed in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The correspondence referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE.
Washington, August 23, 1899.

SIR: On the 10th instant the Department referred to your office for consideration and report, when estimates are submitted, a letter from the Hon. F. E. WARREN, United States Senator from Wyoming, recommending that the estimate for the salary of the United States Indian agent for the Union Agency, Ind. T., also for the chief clerk, be increased, on account of the "remarkable increase in labor and responsibilities" of said officers.

The large amount of disbursements made by said agent under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1899 (30 Stat., 495), renders it important, both to the Government and the claimants, that said disbursements be made quickly as possible consistent with safety to all parties.

When it was proposed by your office on January 7, 1899, to require Agent Wisdom, at said agency, to give an additional bond of $275,000, on account of the collection and disbursement of moneys under the provisions of said act, objection was made by the agent that it cost him $125 more to secure a bond of $50,000 and it was unjust to require such a large special bond with no increase of salary. Thereupon the United States Indian Inspector forwarded said objections of the agent with a recommendation that "Agent Wisdom be not required to give additional bond for reasons stated and that necessary moneys be remitted to him in installments."

On January 27, 1899, you forwarded said paper with the recommendation "that the plan proposed by the agent be adopted."

On January 31, 1899, the Department advised you that "The recommendation of Inspector Wright, as approved by you, is concurred in by the Department, but it is deemed advisable that the Indian agent, in view of the large amount that will be transmitted to him for these special payments, be required to deposit in the subtreasury at St. Louis, Mo., at the end of each week, all the moneys derived from collection, rents, and royalties under the provisions of section 16 and the agreement in section 29 of the act of Congress approved June 28, 1898 (30 Stat., 495).

Experience in the recent payments of the moneys due the Creek Nation shows that it is desirable that the agent receive installment of $50,000 instead of $25,000, and in order to accomplish this his bond should be increased to $100,000, or $50,000 additional. If the agent gives this additional bond, which must cost him, according to Agent Wisdom's statement, $125, his salary should be increased so as to cover the expense incurred and sufficiently remunerate him for his additional duties.

You will therefore request Agent Shoenfelt to give an additional bond of $50,000, and also advise him that should such bond be given the Department will recommend that Congress increase his salary so as to amount to $2,500 per annum.

Very respectfully,

THOS. RYAN,
Acting Secretary.

The COMMISSIONER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Washington, August 24, 1899.

SIR: I inclose herewith a copy of a letter addressed to this office by the Acting Secretary of the Interior, under date of 23d instant, relative to the desirability of your filing an additional or cumulative bond in the sum of $50,000. In compliance with the instructions contained in the last paragraph of said letter, you are hereby requested to give such a bond, and advised that should you do so, the Department will recommend that your salary be increased by Congress to $2,500 per annum. I also inclose the necessary blanks for the proposed new bond, filled up as far as practicable, and a sheet of instructions as to the proper manner of executing the same.

If you comply with the Department's wishes in this matter, you are directed to deposit all funds in your hands and to your official credit to the credit of the United States and close your accounts under your present bond on the day preceding the date of the new one.

You will then open a new set of accounts under both bonds, commencing with and including the date of the new one. Your final accounts under your present bond should be submitted to this office for adjustment without delay and accompanied by a sworn statement made by comparison of your check book with your bank account, showing the number, date, amount, and payee of each check drawn by you as United States Indian Agent and remaining outstanding and unpaid

Very respectfully,

A. C. TONNER,
Acting Commissioner.

Mr. J. B. SHOENFELT,
United States Indian Agent, Union Agency, Ind. T.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Union Agency, Muscogee, Ind. T., January 31, 1900.

The United States Indian agent, Union Agency, Ind. T., is charged by law with the following duties in connection with the administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes:

CHOCTAW AND CHICKASAW NATIONS.

First. The collection of all royalties on coal, asphalt, and other minerals. The amount received for the fiscal year 1899 was $113,313.22.

Second. The collection of all sums due on account of town lots appraised and sold by the town-site commissions.

The volume of work in connection with receiving remittances on account of town lots can only be shown relatively, as thus far but two towns—Sterrett, population, 400, and Colbert, population, 200—have been platted and appraised. In Colbert the commission appraised and sold 76 lots, and at public auction disposed of 173 lots. In Sterrett the commission appraised and sold 206 lots, and at public auction disposed of 700 lots.

Amount received from Sterrett	$4,719.45
Amount received from Colbert	1,271.48
	5,990.93

The Choctaw town site commission, having platted and appraised Atoka, Ind. T., population 2,500, is now engaged in its work at South McAlester, Ind. T., population 4,500. No remittances have been received from Atoka, as it is understood by this office that the plat has not yet met with the approval of the Department.

The Chickasaw town-site commission is at work at Ardmore, Ind. T., a town of some 7,000 or 8,000 inhabitants. The volume of business on account of remittances from this place, as well as the other towns, will greatly increase the work of this office.

Third. Payment of salaries of the 105 neighborhood-school teachers.

Fourth. Payment of the 50 employees and teachers of the five academies of the Choctaw Nation.

These teachers and employees are paid quarterly by checks drawn on the Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

Fifth. Payment of warrants.

The Indian agent is required from time to time to disburse any funds that may be appropriated by Congress out of the moneys held in trust by the United States for the payment of indebtedness, as evidenced by warrants issued by the executives of the Choctaw Nation. For instance, during the quarter closing December 31, 1899, the Indian agent disbursed out of the $75,000 appropriated by the act of March 3, 1899, the sum of $66,093.89.

To make this payment 76 individuals signed the rolls and 443 warrants were canceled and retired. Most of this payment was conducted by correspondence, and almost invariably, the warrants having been issued for a number of years and the custom having been heretofore very lax in reference to indorsements, the warrants presented for payment were improperly indorsed. This, of course, necessitated considerable correspondence before the warrants could be paid.

CREEK NATION.

First. The collection of all royalties on minerals mined.

Second. The collection of occupation and traders' taxes.

There are in the Creek Nation at the present time 36 towns and 550 licensed traders. Amount received for fiscal year 1899, $4,913.63.

Third. The collection of all permit taxes and all other revenues, such as the royalty on hay, cattle, etc.

Fourth. The collection of all sums due and payable on account of town lots appraised and sold by the several town-site commissions.

Fifth. Payment of warrants issued by the principal chief.

During quarter closing September 30, 1899, $199,000 was disbursed and 1,800 warrants canceled and retired. All obligations incurred for every purpose by this nation are paid by means of warrants.

CHEROKEE NATION.

First. Collection of royalty on minerals.

Second. Collection of royalty on hay.

Third. Collection of all permit taxes and the tax on licensed traders.

In the Cherokee Nation there are 93 towns and 675 traders or merchants. Amount collected during the fiscal year 1899, $3,150.87.

As revenue inspectors have been appointed for the Cherokee and Creek nations, the royalties collected under the direction of the Indian agent for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, will be greatly increased.

Fourth. Collection of all moneys due on town lots which have been previously sold by the Cherokee authorities.

Fifth. Payment of warrants.

All indebtedness incurred by the Cherokee Nation is paid by means of warrants issued by the principal chief. All of these warrants bear 6 per cent interest, which is payable yearly. At the present time there are about $600,000 worth of warrants outstanding. About $150,000 is expended each year in paying interest and retiring these warrants.

SEMINOLE NATION.

First. Enforcement of the intercourse laws of the Seminole Nation.

Second. Protection of its citizens from the aggressions of noncitizens.

Third. Advising and counseling with the principal chief and Indian citizens whenever called upon so to do.

GENERAL EXPLANATIONS.

Every remittance must be accompanied by sworn statements in duplicate. These statements show what the remittance is intended to cover. During the quarter closing December 31, 1899, 1,181 remittances were received at this office, which involved the handling of $41,180.96. At the close of each week this money is transmitted to the assistant treasurer of the United States, St. Louis, Mo., and once a month is placed to the official credit of the Treasurer for the benefit of the tribes to which it belongs.

The remittances vary in amount from 15 cents to $3,000 and are received by check, draft, postal and express money order. There is received at this office an average of 70 or 80 letters per day, a number of which are complaints made by Indian citizens on account of encroachments made by white and negro noncitizens. The agent's time is largely occupied in investigating these complaints and answering these letters and in listening to similar complaints made personally by Indians and others on various subjects.

At the present time there are in this office over 400 petitions asking for the removal of noncitizen tenants and renters, for the reason that their leases have expired under the provisions of section 23 of the Curtis Act, which makes void on January 1, 1900, all agricultural and grazing leases.

ASSISTANTS.

To assist the Indian agent in the discharge of his duties there are 6 clerks; and if the volume of business continues to increase, the number of clerks allowed will not be sufficient to handle it.

To carry out and execute the orders of the Indian agent there are 28 Indian policemen.

SALARY.

The salary of the United States Indian agent at this agency is $1,500 per annum, and is not commensurate with the duties and responsibilities of his position. He is bonded for the faithful discharge of his duties in the sum of $100,000, which bond is given through security companies at an annual cost of about $300, thus reducing his salary to about $100 per month, or $1,200 per annum, which is the amount usually paid to chief clerks at Indian agencies. Any erroneous payments which he may make must, under his bond, be made good, and he therefore receives no compensation for the responsibility and risk taken above what a clerk or stenographer with no such responsibility would receive.

Many of the Indian agents on reservations where no money is received and very little, if any, is paid out have a salary of $1,800 per year and furnish a bond of one-half, or less, the amount that the agent at Union Agency is required to give.

Attention is invited to the annual report of my predecessor in office, Col. Dew M. Wisdom, and especially to that part wherein he states:

"In view of my probable retirement from my present position as Indian agent for the Five Civilized Tribes, I feel that as a disinterested party I may and should respectfully suggest that in my opinion the salary of the agent should be increased to one commensurate with its onerous duties and requirements."

RECAPITULATION.

Choctaw and Chickasaw nations.—Collection of royalties on minerals. Collection of money for town lots. Payment of salary of school employees. Payment of warrants.

Creek Nation.—Collection of royalties on minerals. Collection of merchandise and occupation tax. Collection of permit tax. Collection of money for town lots. Payment of warrants.

Cherokee Nation.—Collection of royalties on minerals; collection of permit tax; collection of merchandise tax; collection of money for town lots; payment of warrants.

Seminole Nation.—Enforcing intercourse laws; protection of citizens; advising principal chief.

General.—Investigating and adjusting complaints; regulating trade and intercourse; hearing and making recommendations in reference to the applications of railway companies for additional lands for station purposes. During the quarter ending September 30, 1899, the Indian agent received and disbursed $252,670.71. During the quarter ending December 31, 1899, the agent received $146,288.48, disbursed $115,460.00; balance on hand (subject to disbursement, $30,828.48.

The United States Indian agent for the Union Agency, Ind. T., has jurisdiction over the following tribes, viz: The Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. The entire landed estate, embracing over 19,000,000 acres of land, a territory nearly equal in extent to the State of Indiana, is owned in common by Indians, negroes, and whites, aggregating about 80,000 souls. An additional population of over 400,000 white people make their homes within the Indian Territory.

To supervise and direct the management of the affairs of such a heterogeneous mass of people requires time, patience, and a familiarity with local laws and conditions.

Respectfully submitted.

United States Indian Agent.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES INDIAN SERVICE,
Union Agency, Muscogee, Ind. T., March 17, 1900.

DEAR SENATOR: My salary for the past year will amount to less than $1,000, as I have given three bonds since last April and the premiums have used up a third of my salary. I have received less compensation for my services than a second-rate clerk in my office, and much less than my chief clerk. * * *

I have dictated over 10,000 letters and examined and passed upon about 4,000 complaints, received and disbursed almost a million dollars the past eight months, and have over 200 employees on the pay roll, and have to carry upon my property account all property of the Government in the various schools in the Indian Territory. I am sure the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs do not expect me to do this at a salary less than my chief clerk receives.

With kind regards, I remain, sincerely,

J. BLAIR SHOENFELT.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator state what the salary of the agent at that agency was before?

Mr. THURSTON. One thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the compensation of the agent was only $1,500, and more than $500 of this salary he was compelled to use in securing bond.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. So that $750 is for three quarters of a year?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; as additional compensation for three-quarters of a year.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will suggest that the Senator had better add to the amendment the words "to be immediately available."

Mr. THURSTON. That will give the agent in all $2,250 for the present fiscal year.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. As I understand, the Senator from Wyoming wants to have that $750 paid to the agent now. In that case he ought to add to the amendment that the appropriation should be immediately available.

Mr. WARREN. The suggestion of the Senator is a good one, and I shall be glad to have that language incorporated.

Mr. THURSTON. I am willing to have those words added to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming modifies his amendment by adding the words "to be immediately available." The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 14, on page 37, it is proposed to insert:

That the sum of $12,311, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay the claims for improvements as appraised by an Indian inspector under the provisions of the Indian appropriation act of July 1, 1898, of William Evans, William Jones, Nelson Yarnell, William H. Rogers, administrator of the estate of James Rogers, deceased, and Stefano Geni, made upon lands within the Wind River Indian reservation, in the State of Wyoming, which had been settled upon as unsurveyed public lands prior to their inclusion within the said reservation by the treaty with the Shoshone and Bannock tribes of Indians dated July 3, 1868, and which appears in House Document No. 228, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session.

Mr. THURSTON. The committee had this amendment under consideration and declined to place it upon the bill. Under those circumstances I must oppose it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection until I can very briefly state what I understand to be the case. Of course it is the privilege of the chairman of the committee to make such an objection.

This is a case where, when the Shoshone Indian Reservation was laid out many years ago, certain settlers were already upon the land, and although it was unsurveyed, still, under our common law, they had vested rights. The Government desired their removal and provided for a board of examination, appraisal, and report. The board made an appraisal, and appraised the aggregate value of all their then improvements at $9,871.50. A report was made to Congress, and an attempt was made in the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and subsequent Congresses to appropriate the money, but in every case failed until about 1889. Meantime the money not appropriated, a settlement was never attempted with those settlers until twenty-one years after their property had been appraised.

During the twenty-one years these men went on, as naturally they would, being homesteaders and home builders, with increasing families, improving their property, and by expending money increased its value, so that the later appraisement makes the difference between that first appraisal and the present appraisal, the sum I have asked for in the amendment, $12,311.

The case, as I have stated, ran along—the amount not appropriated—until 1889, when partial payment and settlement was effected. In 1893 the men were removed from the reservation. It is simply a matter of common justice and decent respect for the nation's honor, in my mind, that these settlers should be now paid exactly what the agent of the United States duly detailed for that purpose has lately brought in as the sum yet due them.

If the first appraisal had been acted upon in due and reasonable time and the nine thousand and some dollars had been paid accordingly, that would have closed the incident, and this later payment would never have been demanded. During the twenty-one years that passed before settlement was tendered, these settlers added to their improvements and expended their money to the extent that they now ask reimbursement for.

So the question is, Shall the Government, after waiting twenty-one years, pay for the improvements at the value they were then worth instead of taking into consideration the improvements that were made afterwards and the loss thus suffered by those settlers?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I ask the Senator if the Secretary of the Interior, in the document to which he has referred, does not report unfavorably upon these claims?

Mr. WARREN. I have not discovered such a report.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. My recollection is that he does.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand it, the report from the Interior Department is very much like the reports which sometimes come in here on certain claims from the Court of Claims—that is, they find the facts; they find the amount that is due, without recommending whether it be paid or not. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a claim pure and simple. Whether it ought to be paid or not, it certainly ought not to go on the Indian appropriation bill, and so I make the point of order against it.

Mr. WARREN. I submit that the point of order may lie against the amendment, but I wanted before dismissing the subject to get a declaration from the chairman of the committee whether his objection is on the ground that the claim ought not to be paid or whether it is simply on the matter of a point of order. I think the claim should be paid in some manner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, at the end of line 17, it is proposed to insert:

That wherever there are trust funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of, or moneys due under treaties or other agreements, any tribe or band of Indians, the principal of which or any portion thereof, or the interest on which or any portion thereof, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized by law, in his discretion, to use for the benefit of said Indians, and the parents or guardians of any children entitled to the benefit of such funds shall make choice of a school or schools where they desire their children or wards to be educated, then, and in that event, if, in his judgment, such schools are proper institutions in which to educate children, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to use said funds so belonging to said Indians and set aside for their benefit to pay the expenses, or any part of the expenses, of educating said children in the schools so chosen by said parents or guardians.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will say, in connection with this amendment, that it simply allows the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to use the trust funds for the education of the Indian children in such schools as their parents may desire to send them. It seems to me it is a very proper discretion, and I am confident that the amendment, if adopted, will result in much good to those Indians and prevent the closing of some schools which ought not to be closed. That is all I care to say on the subject.

Mr. THURSTON. I feel constrained to make the point of order on the amendment. I make the point of order that it is legislation and not germane to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 58, at the end of line 8, it is proposed to insert:

For support and education of 50 Indian pupils at St. Labret Mission School, at Tongue River, Montana, $5,400, at not to exceed $108 per annum for each pupil.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think that is open to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It increases an item in an appropriation bill without ever having been sent to the Committee on Appropriations or being reported by a standing or select committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it responsive to existing law?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; it is not responsive to any existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I find on page 60 this provision:

For support and education of 120 Indian pupils at the school at Hampton, Va., $20,040.

The Senate have decided that they will not make any appropriation for sectarian schools, and we have struck out every such item. The last amendment which I offered was for a school in Montana, which is controlled by the Catholic Church. It is a school where we have heretofore contracted for pupils. If we are going to adopt the policy of refusing to contract with outside schools we ought to make it uniform and treat all alike.

The Hampton school is a Protestant school; it is not a Government school; and we make contracts by this special provision for the care of 120 Indian pupils at that place. I should like to know why this exception should be made? We say the Catholics shall not educate the Indians; that we will not contract with them; that we will not deal with any institution outside of the Government schools themselves; and yet we continue this item in the bill. I should like to hear some justification for continuing it in view of the policy which we have clearly established.

Mr. THURSTON. Do I understand the Senator to move to strike out the provision to which he has referred?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Unless I shall hear some good reason why it should remain in the bill, I may make that motion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think I can give a good reason why it should remain in the bill, Mr. President, if the Senator desires to hear it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The school at Hampton, whatever it may have been in the past, is not a sectarian or denominational school at present. It was originally started by the American Missionary Association, but afterwards was incorporated by the State of Virginia, and the American Missionary Association withdrew long ago from any responsibility for the school. It is not sectarian or denominational in any sense.

It is probably true that of all the outside contributions, which are used indiscriminately, I suppose, for education in negro and Indian schools, probably the largest contributions come from persons who are connected with the Protestant churches in the United States. Perhaps I overstate even that.

I presume that the largest contributions come from business people, wealthy people, who either have no church relations or who do not contribute to this school because they have any church relations—for instance, Collis P. Huntington within the past year or two has given, I believe, $100,000 to enlarge the industrial education there. I do not know what church, if any, Mr. Huntington belongs to, but largely the school is sustained by contributions from business people who have been interested in the education of the negroes and the Indians as carried on at that school.

I listened with great interest to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] when he was describing the work which was done by the Jesuits in the Catholic schools which have been established in this country, and in his commendation of the work of Mr. Washington at Tuskegee.

I think, Mr. President, the first inception of the idea of industrial training to make Indians capable of self-support, teaching them trades and occupations, was at the Hampton School; and no institution in the country, neither Carlisle nor any school of the Catholics, has had greater success or so great success in the matter of educating scholars, in training Indian boys and girls so that they shall be fitted to go out and carry on the ordinary occupations which white people carry on in this country. No institution has so good a record, I think; certainly no institution has a better record than this institution as to what the scholars who have gone from there have done. I should like to refer for a moment to that record, if it will not occupy the attention of the Senate too long.

Of the 500 scholars who have been educated there a record has been kept as to what they have done and accomplished since they left the school. They have been educated to the trades; they have been educated as blacksmiths, as carpenters, as harness makers, indeed, in all of the trades, as well as in farming; and the record shows that more than 75 per cent of those scholars who have gone from there have turned out excellently well. Some of them are engaged in machine shops, some away from the reservations in various trades which they learned there; others are teachers at the reservations. It is a wonderful record that this school has made. I desire to put this showing in the RECORD:

The following will show how our returned students have been employed this past year—

That is, those who have been educated there—

Attending higher schools	4
Attending other schools	15
Self-supporting off the reservation (engineers and machinists, 7; printers, 2; blacksmith, 1; painter, 1; trained nurse, 1; servants and farm hands, 4 girls and 9 boys, 13)	25
Teachers, academic (camp, 5; boarding, 12; district, 2)	19
Teachers, industrial	31
Field matrons	3
Church work (catechists, 12; missionaries, 11)	23
Agency employees (interpreters, 5; clerks, 5; police, 9; carpenters and wheelwrights, 19; blacksmiths, 13; millers, 3; agency farmers, 5)	59
United States employees (surveyors, 2; postmaster, 1; soldier, 1)	4

Girls making good homes	88

As in past years, we have kept as perfect a record as possible of the character of the work accomplished and the influence each student seems to have exerted. The 500 now living are graded in this respect as follows:

Excellent (those of unusual ability, influence, and opportunity)	111
Good (those living civilized, Christian lives)	246
Fair (the sick and unfortunate, from whom nothing can be expected)	103
Poor (those not actively bad, but exerting an unfavorable influence)	31
Bad (those doing wrong while knowing better)	9

Out of the 500.

Thus, according to the most reliable information we have been able to obtain, we have a very fair margin to our claim that three-fourths of our returned students are doing well—346 excellent and good records to 40 poor and bad.

That is a wonderful record for any school, even for white scholars, and there is no Indian school or negro school that is doing better work than this school at Hampton. It is not a sectarian institution in any particular, as I have already said. Its contributions are from all classes of people. Catholics have contributed to it. The principal lines of training there are industrial and manual. Those are the two great departments. At the head of each of these departments a Catholic teacher is employed. A Catholic clergyman is called upon to open the services of the school whenever there is opportunity. No discrimination has ever been made against a Catholic teacher or a Catholic employee. I should like to read a word from the testimony of Dr. Frissell on this subject. I asked:

Is there any theological school there?

Mr. FRISSELL. No, sir.

Senator PLATT. You do not pretend to turn out ministers?

Mr. FRISSELL. No, sir; we are devoting ourselves to the industrial and agricultural side of the question. What I do is to make teachers of the negro and Indian race, especially along the industrial and agricultural lines; that those who come out of the schools of the West may be fitted to go back as teachers. We have made a report to the Secretary of the Interior, which has been submitted to Congress, showing that eighty-seven out of every hundred of our Indians have engaged in regular occupation.

That is the best showing that any school has made. I asked this question:

While most of your teachers are Protestants, I understand you to say that you have never in any way run a distinctively Protestant school?

Mr. FRISSELL. No, sir; I do not think so. Of course, most of us, as you say, are Protestants, but I have never asked the question. I have made the point clear since I have been in charge of the school that if he is a good man he should not be shut out because he is a Catholic.

Senator PETTIGREW. Have you a single male instructor who is a Catholic?

Mr. FRISSELL. Yes, sir; in charge of the manual training—Mr. Jenkins.

Senator PETTIGREW. Have you Catholic students?

Mr. FRISSELL. Some. There are comparatively few. We do not teach the dogmas of any church.

Senator PETTIGREW. Do you require them to attend a Protestant church on Sunday?

Mr. FRISSELL. Yes; those who board. I consider the school catholic in the best sense of the word.

Senator PLATT. There is no discrimination against Catholics in any way, shape, or manner?

Mr. FRISSELL. No, sir.

Senator PLATT. Is there any particular denomination that has any influence there?

Mr. FRISSELL. No, sir. The board of trustees, as I said, represent six different denominations, and no one of them has a majority.

Senator PLATT. There are no Catholics on the board of trustees?

Mr. FRISSELL. No, sir; of course, most of our support comes from the Protestant church.

Senator PLATT. You get some from the Catholic?

Mr. FRISSELL. We have had help from the Catholic Church—that is, from individuals.

Senator PLATT. Your help comes from individuals, I suppose?

Mr. FRISSELL. Largely so.

Dr. Frissell further stated:

As I have said, we have had Catholic inspectors and Catholic priests down there who have never made the slightest objection to the sort of training. So far as I know, there has never been a word said against the Catholic Church there.

Senator PLATT. In no sense is it anti-Catholic or pro-Protestant?

Mr. FRISSELL. No, sir; we have prided ourselves that it is nondenominational. We have had meetings all over the country and had on the platforms Catholic priests, Hebrew rabbis, and men of different denominations.

I do not need to go further except to say that when Congressman FITZGERALD appeared before us to be heard in relation to Catholic contract schools he expressed entire satisfaction with the school at Hampton.

Mr. President, it is true that the Government educates Indian children there by contract; that is, it pays for a portion of the education, but it is not true that the school is in any sense sectarian or denominational or Protestant to the extent that it is anti-Catholic. It is a broad, liberal school in those respects and in all respects, and it constitutes, to my mind, an exception to all the other schools which have been heretofore called contract schools.

This matter came up in committee, and the committee, considering it, thought it was a case in which the appropriation was properly made. They do the same thing that they do at Carlisle. There is no difference except that the one is a purely Government school and the other is a school where the Government pays for the scholars.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the Hampton School is a Protestant school and the scholars are compelled to attend the Protestant church service every Sunday, and religious teaching is mixed up with the other teaching during the week. At one time, and very recently, since 1894, they had a theological department; whether it is continued now or not I do not know. There they trained ministers for the Protestant church. They have a chaplain who is a Protestant. The principal of the school is a Congregationalist minister. Some of these Indian pupils have been prepared to become Protestant missionaries, and I see by the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for 1895, page 414, that of the returned students six were missionaries and fifteen catechists.

Now, I think this is a good school. The other contract schools were good schools. Many of them were much better than the schools conducted by the Government—for instance, the St. Ignatius Mission School, in Montana, which, as I recall, has as high record as the Hampton School for efficiency and success in handling and educating Indian children. I am not going to move to strike out the provision for the Hampton School. It was not estimated for by the Department. It was put in by the House. It is a good school. But if we are going to be consistent, if we are going to be fair, if we are to stand upon principle in this case, we ought to treat all alike and prevent dissatisfaction and complaint which can justly be made if we make an exception in this case. The Catholics have a right to say that the Senate of the United States and the Congress of the United States make a discrimination against them in favor of the Protestant churches if they continue this item. We have shut out all the other contract schools, and I think it is our duty to shut out this one or put the others back. While I shall not make the motion now, I shall very earnestly insist that the practice shall not be continued next year, if this item again appears in the bill, unless we treat everybody the same as we treat these people.

While, Mr. President, this question has been raised often and much discussed, and I have examined the reports of the Hampton School time and again, and while I do not think they teach the special dogmas of any particular branch of the Protestant church (and I think there are some thirty or forty different creeds), they teach in general the doctrine of the Protestant church in contradistinction to the doctrines of the Catholic Church. There is no question but that the objection lies which the Catholics urge when they say that we discriminate against them if we continue this item.

No one has ever asked that this item be stricken out, but I must say that they will have good reason to say that we are inconsistent and to ask that it be stricken out in the future if the policy is now settled that no contract schools shall be tolerated.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 13, after the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out the word "five" and insert "six;" so as to read:

At the Yakima Agency, Wash., $1,600.

Mr. FOSTER. This is an increase of the pay of the Yakima agent to $1,600. Heretofore, for many years, he received $1,800 a year, but last year in preparing the appropriation bill it was cut down to fifteen hundred. That is a very important agency, and the salary should be placed back to where it was, $1,800. But still the agent says he will be satisfied if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. THURSTON. The amendment proposes an increase of a hundred dollars, as I understand?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; $100.

Mr. THURSTON. I shall not oppose the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole be concurred in in the Senate in gross?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There was an amendment agreed to the other day, proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Connecticut pardon the Chair? Does the Senator desire to reserve an amendment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I simply wish to call attention to it, and then I shall be willing to have all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole voted on in gross; but I wish to say before the amendment is concurred in that I think it was unnecessary, and then it can go to conference.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator refer to the amendment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It is with reference to the Mississippi Choctaws.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is another thing. I offered another amendment that I desire to find.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. On page 41 of the bill, where the appropriation is made for the Dawes commission, the bill contains this provision with reference to the work of the commission:

But it shall not receive, consider, or make any record of any application of any person for enrollment as a member of any tribe in Indian Territory who has not been a recognized citizen thereof, and duly and lawfully enrolled or admitted as such, and its refusal of such applications shall be final.

That was amended so that it shall be final when approved by the Secretary. Then there is this clause:

But this shall not in any manner affect the provision of the act of Congress of June 28, 1898, respecting the Mississippi Choctaws.

The Senator from Arkansas proposed an amendment. I do not know that I have the amendment here.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, let the amendment be read from the desk.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Let the Secretary state the amendment. It is on page 42.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment to which the Senator refers.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I moved to strike out the words:

But this shall not in any manner affect the provisions of the act of Congress of June 28, 1898, respecting the Mississippi Choctaws—and to insert the words which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That any Mississippi Choctaw, duly identified and enrolled as such by the United States Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, shall have the right at any time prior to the approval of the final rolls of the Choctaws and Chickasaws by the Secretary of the Interior, to make settlement within the Choctaw-Chickasaw country, and on proof of the fact of bona fide settlement they shall be enrolled by the said United States commission and by the Secretary of the Interior as Choctaws entitled to allotment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to raise in the Senate the question whether that amendment shall be concurred in, but I wish to call attention to the fact that I think it entirely unnecessary, in order that when the matter goes into conference it may be carefully considered.

I tried to find the section of the act of 1898 which is referred to in the amendment which was reported by the committee, but I was unable to find it when the amendment was under consideration. This is the language which was stricken out of the bill:

But this shall not in any manner affect the provisions of the act of Congress of June 28, 1898, respecting the Mississippi Choctaws.

That act contains this language:

No person shall be enrolled who has not heretofore removed to and in good faith settled in the nation in which he claims citizenship: Provided, however, That nothing contained in this act shall be so construed as to militate against any rights or privileges which the Mississippi Choctaws may have under the laws of or the treaties with the United States.

The Dawes commission has identified over 1,900 Mississippi Choctaws living in the State of Mississippi. It has made a report, being called upon to do so by the Congress, that in the opinion of the commission each one of these identified Mississippi Choctaws may move even now to the Indian Territory, take up his residence there in good faith, and become entitled to share in the distribution and the allotment of the land, and their rights are fully preserved, as I think, under the statute of 1898.

But, Mr. President, it has come to my knowledge that efforts are being made by attorneys and speculators to induce some of the Indians who still remain in Mississippi to migrate to the Choctaw country for the purpose of becoming entitled to land there. I am assured, and I think I can not be mistaken, that lawyers, as they are called, have been there and have made contracts with some of these Indians that if they will go to the Indian Territory, claim citizenship there, and get the land to which they are entitled, the lawyers will pay their expenses of removal and in return shall receive half of the land.

Others have proposed that they would lend the Indians a hundred dollars apiece to pay the expenses of their removal there, upon the understanding and the contract that when the land was awarded to them the persons lending the money should have a portion of the land to repay the hundred dollars and interest.

I do not wish to do anything to prevent a Mississippi Choctaw from going in good faith to the Indian Territory, take up his residence there, and thus become entitled to his share of the land; but I do not wish to do anything by way of a provision in this bill that will facilitate the speculation which I believe is on foot to take them over there temporarily for the purpose of obtaining land which they are to divide with the lawyers and attorneys and persons who take them there. I simply wish to say this before the amendment is concurred in, in order that the matter may be fully considered in the committee of conference.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment offered by me enlarges the rights of these people in any sense. I think it simply preserves the rights they have under the present law. I agree fully with the Senator from Connecticut in his desire to prevent any such job as he mentions; but, if he will notice, in the amendment offered by me the proposition is that the Mississippi Choctaws may be entitled to property there if they go over and in good faith become citizens of that nation. There must be such circumstances surrounding those people as will satisfy the Dawes commission that they have in good faith removed to the Indian nation with the intention of becoming citizens and residents there. If they choose to do that, it is not necessary for them to do anything except to get money enough to pay their expenses from Mississippi to the Choctaw country to avail themselves of these rights, and there is absolutely no sense in their agreeing to give half of the property they get in the nation to lawyers for permission to do what they can do without anybody's assistance and without permission from anybody in the world. It would indicate that they are simply childish in their business relations.

If they want the land in the Indian Territory, all they have to do is to go there and get the whole of it for themselves, and I see no reason why they should make an agreement to go there and then give one-half of what they get to a lawyer. A lawyer can not help them unless he advances the money on which to make the removal, and there is no doubt that plenty of people would be willing to let them have the necessary money to make the removal on reasonable terms, without undertaking to rob them in that way. I do not see how the amendment can possibly be used for the purpose of carrying out a scheme of that kind; but if there is any possibility of it being done, I agree most cordially with the Senator from Connecticut that it ought to be prevented, and I will join him in making any change necessary to prevent that or in striking the provision out of the bill entirely. In fact, since the committee amendment was made in that section, I am not sure but that the wisest step to take in connection with it is to strike it out.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Is the Senator willing that the Senate should now nonconcur in the amendment, or does he prefer to have it go into conference, to be taken up there?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I prefer that it should go into conference, but I would not seriously object to nonconcurring now. Still it can do no harm to let it go into conference and let the matter be carefully looked into.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is entirely agreable to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, strike out all after the word "hereby," in line 23, and all of lines 24 and 25, and insert:

Granted the right to a patent to the land so entered upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fees, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settlers to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry. All sums due any Indian tribe shall be paid by the United States.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the free-homestead proposition, and will be glad to cooperate with the Senator from South Dakota in securing legislation of that character at this session of Congress. In both Houses bills for that purpose, free-homestead bills, have been reported and are upon the Calendars of the respective Houses. I believe from what I hear that the free-homestead bill is sure to pass the House. I know from the sentiment shown at the former sessions of Congress it is sure to pass the Senate, and I have no doubt that we can secure that very desirable legislation at the present session.

I do not feel, however, that this legislation should be forced upon the pending appropriation bill in violation of the rules of the Senate, and I feel compelled to interpose the point of order that the proposed amendment is legislation and not germane to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to argue the point of order a little. The amendment which I offered is to this paragraph of the bill on page 52:

That the settlers who purchased with the condition annexed of actual settlement on all ceded Indian reservations be, and they are hereby, granted—

That part of the paragraph I do not interfere with. I move to strike out after the word "granted." The bill reads:

An extension to July 1, 1901.

Instead of an extension to July 1, 1901, I propose that they shall not be required to pay at all. As the law now stands, and as it will stand if this paragraph remains in the bill unamended, they would have to pay at the end of another year, and I simply propose to change it so that they shall not have to pay at all.

This same question was up in 1898, when I offered this same amendment, although in a slightly different form, to the Indian appropriation bill, and it was adopted. I moved in that instance to strike out these words from the Indian appropriation bill:

That the settlers who purchased with the condition annexed of actual settlement on all ceded Indian reservations be, and they are hereby, granted an extension of one year, in addition to the extensions heretofore granted, in which to make payments as now provided by law.

I moved to strike out that clause. It is almost identical with the language in the bill as it now stands. Then I moved to insert the following:

That all settlers under the homestead laws of the United States upon the public lands acquired prior to the passage of this act by treaty or agreement from the various Indian tribes, or upon military reservations which have been open to settlement, etc.—

Being the language employed in this amendment.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No, not the same language.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Not the same language exactly, but far more subject to the point of order than what I now propose. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made the point of order against the amendment for the reason that it embraced the military reservation and did not apply solely to Indian reservations. I thereupon withdrew the amendment and offered it with the words "military reservations" stricken out. Here is the amendment which I did offer. I said:

I desire to withdraw the amendment which I have offered and to offer in its place the amendment which I send to the desk, which I ask to have read as a substitute for the other.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment heretofore submitted by the Senator from South Dakota is withdrawn, and he now submits an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 22, 23, and 24, on page 64, and lines 1 and 2, on page 70, and in lieu thereof to insert:

"That all settlers under the homestead laws of the United States upon the public lands acquired prior to the passage of this act by treaty or agreement from the various Indian tribes, who have or who shall hereafter reside upon the tract entered in good faith for the period required by existing law, shall be entitled to a patent for the land so entered upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fees, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settler to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry: Provided, That the right to commute any such entry and pay for said lands in the option of any such settler, and in the time and at the prices now fixed by existing laws, shall remain in full force and effect: Provided, however, That all sums of money so released, which if not released would belong to any Indian tribe, shall be paid to such Indian tribe by the United States."

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the amendment as now modified by the Senator from South Dakota takes away from this proposition, I think, practically any point of order that I can make against it.

Therefore the point of order was not made, or rather it was withdrawn by the Senator from Iowa, and then he proceeded to argue against the desirability of placing it upon the bill. But after mature discussion the amendment was adopted. It seems to me the amendment offered two years ago was much more objectionable in form than the one that I have offered now, and it does not appear to me that this amendment can be subject to the point of order raised by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. Has the Senator finished his remarks?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know that I care to discuss the question further. Of course, if the Chair sustains the point of order, it is not open to discussion.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if this amendment has not been placed upon two Indian appropriation bills before?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It has been upon Indian appropriation bills and passed the Senate upon Indian appropriation bills.

Mr. ALLEN. On two different occasions.

Mr. PETTIGREW. And here is what the Senator from Iowa said about it:

I think a point of order does not lie against the amendment as it has been now modified by the Senator from South Dakota, and therefore I do not make it. But I would make it, of course, if it did lie.

The Senator from Iowa conceded that the point of order would not lie against the amendment. The Chair, it appears, differs with the Senator from Iowa, and as they both have had very long experience I will leave it to the next occupant of the chair to establish the precedent for the Senate upon this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understood that he did.

Mr. ALLEN. On what ground?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Chair makes a ruling, I should like to put on record an observation or two upon this matter for whatever benefit it may be in the future. The rule of law known as stare decisis is as applicable to parliamentary law as it is to the decisions of courts. That rule means that the law of the case as announced, whether it is right or wrong, is controlling in that particular instance. Now, in invoking that rule in aid of this amendment I want to observe that to my certain knowledge this amendment has been upon two appropriation bills heretofore.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not this precise amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. This precise amendment in substance. I do not know that there was any change in the language even.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. If the Senator will permit me, there is a provision in this amendment that if any deficiency shall arise in the payment to the agricultural colleges——

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is not in the amendment. I will inform the Senator. I struck that part out when I offered it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is in the amendment as the Senator proposed it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But not as I offered it.

Mr. ALLEN. Then if that is not in the proposed amendment it is the precise amendment that has been upon the Indian appropriation bill in the Fifty-fourth and Fifty-fifth Congresses. My observation has been heretofore that it is very difficult to tell what the rules of the Senate are in the light of the rulings that are made from time to time. It is not difficult to read the rules. It is not difficult to determine what they mean according to the ordinary interpretation of the English language. But it is difficult, Mr. President, to tell exactly what the Chair will hold them to be.

I recall distinctly on an occasion having the question before the Senate as to whether a proposed amendment was general legislation or not, and a temporary occupant of the chair held that the amendment was general legislation and was within the inhibition of the rule. On five different occasions before that, to my certain knowledge, the same thing in substance had been held by different occupants of the chair not to be general legislation. So the precedents, if we have any, seem to have no value unless the rule of stare decisis is applied here as it is applied in the courts, and as I understand from Mr. Cushing's work to be the proper rule to be recognized by parliamentary bodies.

Now, no man ought to stumble upon the distinction between general and special legislation. It is as marked and distinct as the difference between daylight and darkness. There can be no division of opinion, for the courts have held—and I suppose they are the final judges of these things—that that legislation is general which applies to a general class or a general condition. A law that is universal, or practically so, or reaches an entire class of individuals or interests, is general legislation. Legislation which refers to a specific subject, which is of a local character and not general, is private or specific legislation.

There is not room to discuss the question one way or the other. I suppose it is scarcely within the natural range of discussion of this measure to submit any observations respecting its merits. But, Mr. President, this is a place to talk plainly. It is a place where a man ought to speak his sentiments. It is a place where the people ought to be informed of the condition of measures that are brought before Congress and the reasons why they are before Congress for its consideration.

There is no more meritorious measure in the United States than this free-homes measure, as it is known. The people who occupy these different reservations that have been opened to the settlement of the whites have undergone all the privations of pioneer life, of which many a man in this Chamber knows absolutely nothing. They have taken these lands, it is true, under a contract to pay a given sum. They have been the pioneers of civilization. They have encountered drought after drought and difficulty after difficulty, until the few hundred dollars they took with them have been expended and are gone. Now they find themselves absolutely unable to comply with the contracts they made with the Government.

Is it not good policy under such circumstances that these people shall be permitted to remain on those reservations and keep them open until such time as the natural increase of the rainfall makes them productive, as it will, we are told by scientific men and close observers, in the course of time? Is it not good policy to permit them to remain there and give them these lands for the benefit they may do the country by opening up and holding the reservations open to settlement?

I understand, of course, that there are certain States in the Union where it is said there are no public lands, and because they have no public lands they want no other State in the Union to have public lands.

Now, Mr. President, there is no reason in that. That is the argument of prejudice. It is the argument of selfishness. The people who have opened up those new States to settlement and who have blazed the way to civilization there have undergone privations of which the settlers in the Eastern and older States know but little; and all these privations speak loudly in behalf of a just and a humane policy to the settlers upon those lands. They can not pay this sum of money. It is impossible to expect it if conditions continue as they are in many instances. What is to be done under those circumstances? Are they to be turned out of the homes they occupy and that they built? Are all their improvements to become worthless and forfeited to the Government? Are they not to be taken into consideration at all?

This rule, Mr. President, has been invoked to do more injustice in this Chamber than all the other rules combined. Whenever a Senator finds himself arrayed against a proposed amendment he raises the question of its being objectionable under Rule XVI, and of course if he has the power behind him the objection is sustained, and if he has not it is overruled.

I want to submit, Mr. President, in all candor, in all fairness, that these things ought to be determined with judicial accuracy. It ought not to be left to the caprice of the occupant of the chair, whoever he may be. There ought to be a beaten pathway. There ought to be precedents that will be binding upon the conscience and the judgment of the occupant of the chair, and they should be as exact as a judicial decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3419) making further provision for a civil government for Alaska, and for other purposes. I will change that, on suggestion, to a request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3419. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I understand the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] was temporarily laid aside, and pending the arrival of Senators interested in that amendment I will present several formal amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana submits an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 329, section 755, after the word "States," in line 8, insert: "or has declared his intention to become such;" in the same line amend by inserting after the word "and" the words: "is a resident."

Mr. STEWART. What amendment is that?

Mr. CARTER. The amendment relates to section 755 and concerns the qualifications of persons admitted to practice law in the district of Alaska. As the section now reads only citizens of the United States could be admitted to the bar. The purpose of the amendment is to likewise admit persons who have declared their intention to become such.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. In what section?

Mr. CARTER. Section 755, page 329.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Let the section be read as it would read if amended.

The SECRETARY. If amended, the section would read:

First. That he is a citizen of the United States or has declared his intention to become such and is a resident of said district and of the age of 21 years, which proof may be made by his own affidavit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted on page 330 in lieu of section 758.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. What became of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]? I thought that amendment was pending.

Mr. CARTER. That was temporarily laid aside, and at my suggestion, pending the arrival of Senators who are interested in that amendment, these formal amendments are being presented.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That amendment is still pending?

Mr. CARTER. It is still pending.

Mr. BATE. Yes, it is still pending.

Mr. STEWART. I propose to call attention to that amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Let the amendment I have now proposed be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out section 758, on page 330, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whenever an applicant for admission as an attorney shall present to the district court a certificate showing him to have been duly admitted to practice as an attorney in the highest courts of any State or Territory of the United States, or in one of the circuit courts, or the Supreme Court of the United States, such applicant may be admitted to practice as an attorney without further examination.

Mr. BATE. Let the section be read that it is proposed to substitute.

Mr. CARTER. The section would read just as the amendment reads. The motion is to strike out the section and insert what has been read. The purpose is to permit——

Mr. BATE. That is what I say; but let us see what the original is, to see which is preferable. That is the point.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 758, in the following words:

Whenever it appears that a person of any State or Territory is an attorney of the highest court of record in such State or Territory, he may appear as counsel for a party in a particular action, suit, or proceeding then pending in court, or before a judicial officer of the district, but not otherwise.

Mr. BATE. Now let the amendment to the section be read.

The SECRETARY. The section if amended will read as follows:

SEC. 758. Whenever an applicant for admission as an attorney shall present to the district court a certificate showing him to have been duly admitted to practice as an attorney in the highest court of any State or Territory of the United States, or in one of the circuit courts, or the Supreme Court of the United States, such applicant may be admitted to practice as an attorney without further examination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. In the amendment heretofore offered, on page 23 of the bill, at the end of section 26, I propose, after the second proviso, immediately after the word "shall" where it first appears, to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 23, section 26, line 14, after the word "shall" where it first appears in the proviso, it is proposed to insert "be subject to such general rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time prescribe, and shall."

Mr. STEWART. That amendment, I hope, will be reserved until after the argument on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. BATE. How will the section read as proposed to be amended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The section will be read as proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. As proposed to be amended, it will read:

Provided further, That the rules and regulations established by miners shall be subject to such general rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may from time to time prescribe, and shall not be in conflict with the mining laws of the United States, etc.

Mr. STEWART. Before that amendment is considered I have some suggestions to make that will be appropriate in discussing the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. Let that come up first.

Mr. BATE. That, I understand, is altogether a new amendment.

Mr. CARTER. This is presented for the purpose of perfecting the amendment as it now stands.

Mr. STEWART. I have an amendment to the amendment to offer.

Mr. CARTER. I will withdraw the amendment for the time being to accommodate the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. STEWART. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] is the amendment now pending, as I understand.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota is the amendment now pending.

Mr. STEWART. I ask that that amendment may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 73, on page 469, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 73. That persons who are not citizens of the United States, or who prior to making location had not legally declared their intention to become such, shall not be permitted to locate, hold, or convey mining claims in said district of Alaska, nor shall any title to a mining claim acquired by location or purchase through any such person or persons be legal. In any civil action, suit, or proceeding to recover the possession of a mining claim, or for the appointment of a receiver, or for an injunction to restrain the working and operation of a mining claim, it shall be the duty of the court to inquire into and determine the question of the citizenship of the locator: Provided, That no location of a mining claim shall hereafter be made in the district of Alaska by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact, and all locations heretofore made by any person or persons through an agent or attorney in fact upon which $100 worth of labor or improvements had not been expended or made within ninety days first succeeding the date of such location are hereby declared to be null and void.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, when this amendment was first proposed and I made some remarks upon the liberal treatment extended to miners by the English Government and our own Government, I was met with the assertion that the laws of Canada and of British Columbia were extremely brutal; that they did not allow American miners to work the gold mines of that country. I was very much surprised at this statement; and I wish there were a full Senate, that I might correct the false impression that has undoubtedly gone out from the assertions that were then made. I do not like to suggest the want of a quorum, but I should like to have the Senate know what the Canadian laws are. I have them here, and I think before we proceed or undertake retaliatory measures we ought to know how we are treated by them.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll; and the following Senators answered to their names.

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Kenney,	Quarles,
Allen,	Forakar,	McBride,	Ross,
Allison,	Foster,	McComas,	Shoup,
Bacon,	Frye,	McMillan,	Simon,
Bard,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Stewart,
Bate,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Teller,
Berry,	Harris,	Penrose,	Thurston,
Carter,	Hawley,	Perkins,	Turley,
Clay,	Heitfeld,	Pettus,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Platt, Conn.	Warren,
Culberson,	Jones, Nev.	Platt, N. Y.	Wolcott.
Cullom,	Kean,	Proctor,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorom is present. The Senator from Nevada will proceed.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I regard the facts as to the mining laws of Canada and British Columbia as very important. Inasmuch as there has been so much said which might be regarded by our neighbors as abusive and unjust, and which might lead to retaliation on their part, I think it is well that we should understand exactly what they have done. I have looked up all the mining laws of Canada and British Columbia and have made a synopsis of them. That synopsis is here, and if any Senator wishes to read it at length, he may do so. The "Laws of Canada, 1898," English edition, under the head of "Orders in Council," etc., page 20, are as follows:

REGULATIONS GOVERNING PLACER MINING IN THE YUKON, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES.

Title interpretation.—"'Free miner' shall mean a male or female over the age of 18 or under that age, or joint stock company, named in and lawfully possessed of a valid existing free miner's certificate and no other."

"Free miners and their privileges."—1. Every person, but not under 18 years of age, shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges of a free miner * * * and shall be considered a free miner upon taking out a free miner's certificate. * * *

2. A free miner's certificate may be granted for one year * * * upon the payment therefor of the sum of $10.

That is, Canadians and Americans were treated exactly alike.

At Page L of the above volume, regulations concerning quartz-mining claims, part 1, "every person over the age of 18 shall be considered a free miner. A free miner's certificate runs for one year."

Royalty to be paid: At Page XLIV, section 30, of above volume, a royalty of 10 per cent of the gross product from any placer mine is exacted, but this royalty is not to be applied where the amount of gold taken out of any single claim is less than $5,000 in any single year.

NOTE.—Formerly the amount of exemption was $2,500, but this was changed by order in council of March 30, 1899. (See Statutes of Canada, English edition, 1899, Page LXVXII.)

There is no royalty exacted from quarts miners, and there is no alien law as applied to such claims.

BRITISH COLUMBIA MINING LAWS.

In January, 1899, a law was passed by British Columbia confining the issuing of miners' licenses for placer mining to British subjects. This act applied only to claims located after February 3, 1899, the date when the news of the change from free mining reached Atlin, British Columbia. Previous to this free mining for both quartz and placer was allowed. There is a 1 per cent royalty on gross output in certain classes of mines in British Columbia in lieu of the ordinary property tax. Quartz mining is free to all persons in British Columbia. (See Engineering and Mining Journal, volume 67, at pages 107, 126.)

The Atlin district is just over the line in British Columbia. Dawson and all that region where mining has been carried on is in what they call the Yukon territory. Foreigners and citizens are treated alike. This law of British Columbia did take in the Atlin district, but that district turned out not to amount to much, and very little mining is pursued there. I do not know about the administration of the law, but so far as the law itself is concerned in the Yukon district, it is the same for foreigners as for natives; and it was the same for foreigners and natives in British Columbia and all over Canada until 1899.

As to placer claims in Canada, the law was changed in 1899, but it did not take effect until news reached Atlin that this mining district had been established. That was a very unfortunate law, because it did them very little good and broke a rule which had prevailed very long. As to quartz mining, however, which is the main thing in which our people are interested, there is nothing required but a miners' license to be taken out once a year, of $10 or $5; I think not over ten. That applies to all of them alike.

So there is no hostile legislation whatever except the act of 1899, which applies to British Columbia alone, and does not reach the Yukon region. Under the Canadian statutes and the statutes of British Columbia, so far as our country is concerned, we have had practically free mining, and foreigners have located there from time immemorial, although the statutes of 1872 of the United States provide that mineral lands shall be only open to exploration and development by citizens of the United States and those who have declared their intention to become such; but that in practical operation has had no particular value on account of the decisions of the courts upon that subject. There has been free mining to foreigners as well as to natives. The Supreme Court holds that if an alien locates nobody can take advantage of that but the Government; that his title is good if the Government does not interfere. I have here the case—perhaps the most recent case, in 152 United States Supreme Court Reports, decided in 1893, on page 505—the case of Manuel vs. Wulff. The syllabus of the case is as follows:

A deed of a mining claim by a qualified locator to an alien operates as a transfer of the claim to the grantee, subject to question in regard to his citizenship by the Government only.

If, in a contest concerning a mining claim, under Revised Statutes, section 2326, one party, who is an alien at the outset, becomes a citizen during the proceedings and before judgment, his disability under Revised Statutes, section 2319, to take title is thereby removed.

Under the decision of the court nobody can take advantage of this disability but the Government, and people have been selling there and people have been buying. The law is well settled, and we have pursued a very liberal policy, which has been reciprocated by our Canadian neighbors so far as their legislation is concerned. There is a very large amount of property now held by American citizens in British Columbia in gold and silver mines. Vast interests are involved in this, and hostile legislation will only make more friction and accomplish no good result. But, as has been stated here——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the size of a placer claim in Canada is 250 feet on the creek line, as I understand it, and the same locator is entitled also to 250 feet on what is known there as a hill claim. On our side of the line placer claims are 1,320 feet in length; at any rate, they are 20 acres, as fixed in the statutes. There is a difference in that respect between the laws of Canada and the laws of the United States.

Mr. STEWART. That does not relate to citizenship or to aliens.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly not. Just one other word, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The American miner who goes to Canada and who works in the mines must pay a royalty, whilst Canadian miners pay no royalty on this side.

Mr. STEWART. They all pay the same. After they have taken out $5,000 in a placer claim, all pay 10 per cent.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not on our side.

Mr. STEWART. On their side.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I admit that.

Mr. STEWART. I say the only discrimination between natives and foreigners in all the Canadian and British Columbia legislation consists in the act of 1899 of British Columbia, which is confined to British Columbia, where they prohibit foreigners from locating placer claims to go into effect after notice is given in the locality. Otherwise, up to that time, their laws treated their own citizens and foreigners precisely the same.

There has been much said about the Laplanders as an excuse for this violent legislation against foreigners. I find that that is not sustained by the facts. I will ask the Secretary to read a portion of the pamphlet which I send to the desk.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Before the Senator passes from that——

Mr. STEWART. I have not passed from that, and I will not pass from that for half an hour.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I say before the Senator passes from the particular phase of the subject which he has been discussing, I desire to call his attention to a decision of the court from which he read a while ago, in the case of Manuel vs. Wulff. As I understand it, in that case the locators in the mines in controversy were American citizens.

Mr. STEWART. Oh, well, we will deal with that. I want to have read from the report of Sheldon Jackson, LL. D., general agent of education in Alaska, in regard to these Lapps and their wonderful wickedness. I ask the Secretary to read what I have marked, commencing on page 46.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

NATURALIZATION OF THE LAPPS.

As an evidence of the purpose of the Norwegians and Lapps recently brought over from Lapland to become permanent citizens, the following persons have taken out their first naturalization papers: Magnusi Kjeldsberg, Johan Eira, Wilhelm Basi, Lauritz Stephansen, Johan Hilmar Hansen, Karl Johan Sacariasen, Ole M. Rapp, Alfred Hermansen, Ole Olsen Bar, Jeremias Abrahamsen, Isak Johannesen Hatta, Isak Salamonsen Nakkila, Per Andersen, Samuel Johannesen Balto, Nils Person Sara, Nils Klemetsen, Lauritz Larsen, Otto M. Leinan, Hans Samuelsen, Ole G. Berg, Thoralf Kjeldberg, Peder Berg, Ole Johansen Stenfjeld, Karl Ove Suhr, Japeth Lindeberg, Ole Krogh, and Johan Petter Stalogargo.

The Lapps are well satisfied with their new home, and promise to make a very valuable and important addition to the population of Alaska and the development of its resources.

In my estimation, next to the discovery of gold, the most important event, commercially, in the history of Alaska during this year is the importation of this colony of Lapps. Experience is rapidly demonstrating that the only possible efficient transportation service in Alaska must be through the use of reindeer, and this necessitates the trained and expert drivers of reindeer found among the civilized Lapps and Finns. The 68 men that were brought over by this expedition are all picked men and expect to be permanent settlers of Alaska. They hope ultimately to have herds of their own and raise and train reindeer to sell to the transportation companies. Their success will naturally attract others of their people and render permanent the establishment of the reindeer industry in Alaska.

In this connection I make acknowledgments of the assistance rendered in the movement of the Lapps and reindeer by Brig. Gen. Henry C. Merriam, U. S. A., commanding the Department of the Columbia; also to Capt. W. W. Robinson, jr., U. S. A., at Seattle; Capt. B. Eldridge, U. S. A.; Capt. D. L. Brainard, U. S. A.; Capt. William R. Abercrombie, U. S. A.; Lieut. W. S. Graves, U. S. A., and especially to my associate, Capt. D. B. Devore, U. S. A., who shared with me in the perplexities, difficulties, and hardships encountered in Lapland.

Mr. STEWART. I will say to the Senator that I will furnish him some further authorities on this point if he desires them. I have sent for the books. But I will go on with my remarks. I ask the Secretary, in regard to the history of this matter, to read an affidavit of Dr. Kittilsen, the recorder.

The Secretary read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, city of Washington, ss:

Albert N. Kittilsen, M. D., being first duly sworn, on oath says, that he is a citizen of the United States, and has been a resident of the Territory of Alaska since 1896; that he arrived at Cape Nome, Alaska, about October, 1898; that prior to that time there were three men located at Cape Nome; two of them were Swedes by birth, but had been in the United States some ten or fifteen years; the third was a Norwegian. Two other persons went there with me—one of them a Laplander and one an American citizen. The Laplander had declared his intention to become an American citizen in the early spring of that year, and his declaration was filed before L. B. Shepherd, who was a United States commissioner at St. Michaels.

The six persons who were then at Cape Nome located claims; some of them had located previous to our arrival. We then formed a mining district and adopted rules and regulations under the laws of the United States. I was elected recorder. A few weeks after that miners from the surrounding country commenced coming in, and during the following winter the number rose to between two hundred and three hundred. I recorded all their claims, and in every sense was recognized and acted as mining recorder. The first Laplander located three good claims; one for himself, one for his brother, and one for an associate, who arrived soon after and took possession and worked the claims. These Laplanders worked their claims during the working season of 1899 and sold out to Mr. Lane in the fall of 1899. One Norwegian located claims on about six different streams and has been in possession of them ever since. The claims of these Laplanders, while they were in possession and working them, were relocated by other persons called "jumpers." Later on the claims of the Norwegian were relocated by "jumpers" and recorded by me, because it was my duty to record all claims presented for recordation. I was so instructed by the judge of the district court.

In the summer of 1899 three lawyers located themselves at Cape Nome whose names were Hubbard, Beeman, and Hume. These relocators, although they did not take possession or work upon the claims they relocated or "jumped," employed Hubbard, Beeman & Hume as their attorneys. Mr. Hubbard, of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, an attorney for the relocators, is in the city of Washington. I met him on the 5th of this month in the committee room of Senator HANSBROUGH.

I have no interest whatever in any of the "jumped" or relocated claims, either as original locator or as a relocator, and no private interest that would be affected by any of the proposed legislation.

A. N. KITTILSEN, M. D.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 6th day of April, 1900, at Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] ELKANAH N. WATERS,
Notary Public.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Kittilsen was elected recorder by the first six. There were very few there. He was one of them. That is usual in going into a mining district. If the rules and regulations are unsatisfactory, when the rush comes they are changed. The fact that they recognized him is a thorough confirmation of his title, and it is what occurs usually in mining regions. The few who get there first make the rules, and if when the others come the rules are not satisfactory, they have a miners' meeting and revise them. No revision was made at all. He continued to record them, and every man who came there to get his claim recorded added to the custom. He has been recorder up to the present time. Consequently he has the best means of knowing exactly what occurred.

Now, it will be observed that this amendment absolutely forfeits the claims which Mr. Lane bought to the persons who relocated them. The one Laplander who happened to be a foreigner intended to become a citizen. He made every effort to become a citizen. He went there to reside. He went before the commissioner. He supposed that was sufficient. He did it in good faith. The remainder were citizens so far as we know. One of the Norwegians had failed to declare his intention to become a citizen. These claims were relocated after Mr. Lane had bought them. The Laplanders had only a few claims, because there are only a few good claims in any district. They are claims which he bought at a high price. This is no attempt to swindle anybody. They were the pioneers. They were there first and had a right to it. They were subsequently located. The subsequent location, of course, would not stand a minute in court or before a jury, under decisions of the courts; but if this amendment is adopted these claims are transferred from the purchasers, from those who located them, from those who have invested a large amount of money in them, to men who have done nothing. They simply located them and appointed attorneys, and one of their attorneys is here in the Capitol visiting committee rooms. The affidavit so states as to one of the attorneys for these men who jumped the claims; and if they can succeed, of course they will make a very large amount of money.

Now, the question comes right down to this: Is the Senate to legislate one man's property into the hands of another? Mr. Lane is perfectly satisfied with his title in the courts. There is no doubt about that. He asks no assistance from anybody. He is in good faith; but if you nullify his title, the title of those who have located since, and have not done a day's work upon the claims, becomes good. That is what we are liable to do in a case like this, without understanding the facts. I did not anticipate that there was anything so grossly unjust in this, and of course the Senator from North Dakota would not know anything about it; none of us would have known anything about it. We take representations from far off, but unless we exercise great care in changing the laws we are liable to do great injustice.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to say that the owner of this property, Mr. Lane, is satisfied with the law as it now stands?

Mr. STEWART. Entirely.

Mr. BATE. What would be the situation, then, in case the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota should pass?

Mr. STEWART. He would lose his title.

Mr. BATE. How much is there involved?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, he is involved very largely.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand further that he purchased the claim from a Lapp who thought he had taken the necessary steps to become a citizen, but in point of fact had not?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; one of the best claims.

Mr. BATE. I wish the Senator would explain how it is that Mr. Lane should be content with the law as it is.

Mr. STEWART. Nobody can take advantage of that but the Government, and he does not fear that the Government will confiscate his claim. Then, if the Government should hold that he is not entitled to hold it under that title, he himself could locate it if he had a fair chance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Nevada know how much Mr. Lane paid for these claims?

Mr. STEWART. I have a letter from Mrs. Lane to show the investment there.

Mr. BATE. Read it as a part of your speech, unless it is private.

Mr. STEWART. No, sir; it is not private.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 6, 1900.

MY DEAR SIR: I desire to make a statement to you as to the amount of money invested by my husband, C. D. Lane, in the purchase and working of mining claims and general development of Alaska.

The amount expended in the purchase of mining claims is something over $300,000. He has already purchased a pumping plant to be used in supplying water to the miners in the vicinity of Cape Nome owning claims on which there is no natural water supply. In the purchase of this necessary pumping plant and the pipe lines and ditches connected therewith he has already and will have expended within the next season $400,000. The materials necessary for the construction and operation of about 5 miles of railroad have also been purchased, and this railroad will be constructed during the coming season at an expense of about $60,000.

I send you this communication in order that you may know what Mr. Lane has already done and what he contemplates doing, not only for himself, but also for the general development of the Cape Nome mining region, as the railroad and pumping plant are an absolute necessity for the proper development of the mining claims in that region.

Yours, very truly,

(MRS.) C. D. LANE.

Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART,
United States Senate.

Mr. BATE. Do I understand that Mr. Lane gets any advantage by virtue of having possession of the property now? I am not familiar with the mining laws. I desire to know whether he has any advantage by virtue of holding that property for years past? Will he have an advantage in perfecting his title over any other person?

Mr. STEWART. He has the advantage of guaranteed possession. Nobody can take possession from him; not the United States.

Mr. BATE. But suppose the amendment passes; then what?

Mr. STEWART. Then the other man will be the prior locator.

Mr. BATE. Mr. Lane loses his property?

Mr. STEWART. He loses his property absolutely.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the letter which he has just read—it is a delicate thing to criticise a letter written by a lady—states in a general way that Mr. Lane has expended about $300,000 in Alaska. The Senator from Nevada does not desire the Senate to understand that Mr. Lane has expended $300,000 on these alien claims?

Mr. STEWART. There are no alien claims.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I claim that there are.

Mr. STEWART. I claim there are not.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There are a great many of them.

Mr. STEWART. There are not. He bought no alien claims. One or two of the very best claims—one, I believe—were located by a Laplander, who came to this country and desired to become a citizen, but he was advised by those who brought him out there that he could file his declaration when he got to St. Michaels before a commissioner of the United States there. All hands thought he had a right to, and that was long before he made any location. The United States, under those circumstances, would never take this advantage. He acted in good faith. If it intends to do justice the United States will ratify that declaration and make it effective. It will cure that by an act of legislation, because it was done in good faith. It was six months before this discovery that he made the declaration of his intention to become a citizen. All of his comrades who went out with him became citizens. Not one went back. They are all working in different capacities in that country, because it is to them a congenial climate like that in which they were reared, and they like the country.

Mr. BATE. May I ask one question in this connection? Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to say that the man who located one of the most valuable claims had taken steps, six months before the discovery, to become a citizen?

Mr. STEWART. Six months before.

Mr. BATE. And he is the one who located this claim?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; it was six months before.

Mr. BATE. Before it was found?

Mr. STEWART. Yes, sir; that is the man. It was six months before. He supposed he was an American and that he had a right to locate when he went into that country, where he is now residing. The Laplanders and Swedes were accustomed to the climate and could go where the others would not go, and they made these discoveries; and all of them were citizens, or declared their intention of becoming citizens, before they went there. This man supposed he had; and it would be unjust to take the best claim and give it to a man who relocated it and then employed a lawyer in Washington. He never did any work upon it and never had possession.

Mr. TELLER. What was done in the way of location?

Mr. STEWART. Nothing.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator, as he no doubt is aware, that the courts of the United States have repeatedly declared that when a piece of land is in possession of a miner nobody can invade that possession and get title. These people who filed their claims got no title. If the Laplanders have not got any title, the court will say so when the matter gets into court. That is the place to leave it. We have no business to take it away from them, in my judgment.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me to interrupt him, I will state that the object of this amendment is not to legislate for the future. It is to legislate in the interest of those who have jumped these claims.

Mr. BATE. Have it read.

Mr. NELSON. That is what it is.

Mr. TELLER. To legislate in the interest of them?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; to enable them to go into the country and get a standing in court, which they would not otherwise have.

Mr. TELLER. If they have any claim there, they have a standing in court. We do not want to give them a claim by legislation which they have not now, do we?

Mr. NELSON. No.

Mr. TELLER. The amendment may mean that; I presume it does. I think it is safe for us to leave this thing alone and let the courts settle it. The courts have said that when a man, being a foreigner, went on the public grounds, nobody but the Government could raise that question. They will be allowed to stay there, and these people who went up there in good faith and thought they were citizens, tried to be citizens, ought not to be interfered with.

Mr. BATE. But this very amendment, as I understand it, proposes to interfere with that.

Mr. TELLER. That is where the trouble seems to be. The amendment seems to take it away from the courts and to attempt to settle it here.

Mr. BATE. I read it as the Senator from Minnesota reads it.

Mr. TELLER. That is what it intends.

Mr. BATE. It is intended to disturb existing law, and it carries with it these evils.

Mr. TELLER. We do not want to settle that question. Let the court settle it.

Mr. ALLEN. If these Laplanders entered the mining claims in good faith, complied with the law on the supposition that they were citizens, or at least in a legal attitude that would authorize them to make the entry, and sold the claims in good faith, and afterwards it was demonstrated that they were not qualified to make the entry, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado whether it does not present a case for legislation rather than for the courts?

Mr. TELLER. What does the Senator propose—to confirm their title?

Mr. DANIEL. This would destroy that.

Mr. TELLER. This would destroy their title, as I understand. Their title is all right if we let it alone.

Mr. ALLEN. I have not read the amendment. I supposed it was broad enough to cover that.

Mr. TELLER. Their title is all right if we do not pass any legislation on the subject. If we leave them alone where they are, the courts will take care of their title, unless the Attorney-General institutes a suit, which he is not likely to do.

Mr. ALLEN. Is there any question about the good faith of those who entered these mining claims, and is there any question about the good faith of the purchasers from the Laplanders?

Mr. DANIEL. Not a suggestion.

Mr. TELLER. I know absolutely nothing on that point, and I can not answer the question; but I have the feeling which a man gets who has lived in a mining camp for pretty nearly forty years. That is, that the men who make the first location, who are the first discoverers, are the men who are to be taken care of and protected; and in our country we do not care very much whether a man is a citizen or whether he is not. We all approve of that rule of the court which says "we will not hear any citizen complain of that, but if there is any complaint it must come from the Government."

If these people are let alone, the court will hold that they had good title and that they had a right to transfer the title; that is, if they complied with all the conditions of the law, of course.

Mr. ALLEN. How did the Laplanders happen to be in that country?

Mr. TELLER. They went there in the interest of the Government to take care of the reindeer, in the first place. After their term of service to the Government had expired they turned out to be farmers and stock raisers and almost everything. Some of them have gone to raising deer and others to mining.

Mr. ALLEN. Was there any understanding when they went there that they were to become permanent residents?

Mr. TELLER. That was the understanding I had at the time. They agreed to stay with the Government for a certain time and then they had a right to quit. I will say I was consulted about it. I was very anxious to get some of that class of people in there, because I believed they would make the country worth something to the people of the United States. They are adapted to that climate; Mr. Jackson took great pains to get them there, and they have been very satisfactory, I believe. If they did not make themselves citizens when they tried to, it does not make any difference so far as their right to hold this property is concerned. They have a right to hold it if they are not citizens.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota is inequitable. Its sting is found in these words:

> Nor shall any title to a mining claim acquired by location or purchase through any such person or persons be legal.

The "persons" referred to being those who are not citizens of the United States. We have had a memorandum laid before us from certain American citizens who acquired mining claims from certain Laplanders who had gone into Alaska for the purpose of aiding the United States in its reindeer service, and who came with the full intent and purpose of becoming citizens of this country. Many of them did take out their papers legally and properly, and consummated that purpose. Quite a number of them, however, made the appropriate affidavits before a commissioner of the United States, being assured by him, an officer of the United States, and being assured by their friends, that this was all right. Titles have been derived through them, and to step in and destroy those titles in order that benefits afterwards discovered and afterwards accruing may go to new comers, would seem to be inconsistent with a just and an equitable spirit.

In a rude, cold, uncomfortable, little-inhabited region like Alaska, and dealing with persons who have acted in good faith, but who had natural ignorance as to the peculiar technicalities of American law, we ought to deal in no sharp and rigid spirit, but with the utmost regard for the natural principles of right and justice. I will give no opinion upon the question whether in a court of equity, under the rules of equity jurisprudence, a claim might not be made and supported by those who, under the peculiar circumstances of these well-intentioned Laplanders, obtained these titles. That is not necessary. The rules of equity jurisprudence are for a technical science. They must leave out, by their regularity and uniformity, many cases which possess the strongest appeal to the equity of a legislative body.

Now, with respect to these people, they have excellent credentials. They are highly spoken of, and I will read a brief extract quoted from the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson on the introduction of domestic reindeer into Alaska, which is found in Senate Document No. 34, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, which says of them what I will read. He gives the names of 68 Laplanders who were introduced into this country. He speaks of the beneficent service they have rendered, and here is his estimate of the value that they are to that country and to us:

In my estimation—

He says—

next to the discovery of gold, the most important event, commercially, in the history of Alaska during this year is the importation of this colony of Lapps. Experience is rapidly demonstrating that the only possible efficient transportation service in Alaska must be through the use of reindeer, and this necessitates the trained and expert drivers of reindeer found among the civilized Lapps and Finns. The 68 men that were brought over by this expedition are all picked men and expect to be permanent settlers of Alaska.

The people with whom we are at present dealing are those who took every step in good faith unchallenged to execute their preconceived intention of permanent residence in that region, and for a great Government, like ours is, which needs such inhabitants, which has the opportunity to gather them into that region through the methods which have brought these pioneers, to deal with them severely seems not consistent with the just temper of the American people nor with true principles of equity.

I agree with what the honorable Senator from Colorado has said, and he is much more familiar with such topics than I am, that we had better vote down this amendment and leave these questions to settle themselves.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada has referred to the fact that there are some lawyers in Washington City who are striving for the enactment of this amendment into a law. I presume that is true. In fact I know of one gentleman, at least, who is here in that interest, a gentleman by the name of Hubbard. He has been referred to in an affidavit which has been read at the desk, the affidavit of Dr. Kittilsen, who came to my committee room a few days ago with a letter of introduction from the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and while he was there he met Mr. Hubbard. I think that affidavit referred to him by name, and therefore I think I am justified in having read at this point an affidavit from Mr. Hubbard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Secretary will read the paper submitted by the Senator from North Dakota.

The Secretary read as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, City of Washington, ss:

Oliver P. Hubbard, being duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States, an attorney at law, engaged in the practice of his profession at Nome City, in the Cape Nome mining district, district of Alaska, United States of America; that he first went to Alaska in the spring of 1898; that he is a member of the law firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, of Nome City, Alaska; that the members of the firm are Edwin B. Beeman, formerly a practicing attorney of Minneapolis, Minn., and William I. Hume, formerly a practicing attorney at Portland, Oreg., and this affiant, formerly a practicing attorney at Chicago, Ill.

Affiant says that the firm of Hubbard, Beeman, & Hume are attorneys in a number of mining suits now pending in the United States district court for the District of Alaska; that among others are suits brought to recover the possession of certain mining claims alleged to have been staked by alien Laplanders; that these claims were located by American citizens in the months of November and December, 1898; that all of the alleged Laplander and alien locations were located by American miners in the fall of 1898 and the winter of 1898 and 1899; that among the miners who made such locations were Louis Meising and John Waterson; that these two miners located claims on Anvil Creek, in said Cape Nome mining district, which, it is alleged, were theretofore located by Laplanders; that, on or about the month of March, 1900, Meising and Waterson were arrested at Chenik, a point on Golvin Bay, and carried to St. Michael under arrest, the arrest having been made by the military authority, the troops being under command of Lieutenant Spaulding, who was acting under instruction from Capt. E. S. Walker, in command at Fort Get There, at St. Michael; that this arrest was made by reason of the said Meising and Waterson having made the aforesaid locations on Anvil Creek; that one L. B. Shepherd, formerly United States commissioner at St. Michael, was a party to this arrest; that the two men arrested were carried to St. Michael, a distance of not less than 150 miles, and there detained for three weeks, and were then released, they having in the meantime refused to make transfers of the claims to the Laplanders, as they were pressed to do by the officers having them under arrest; that the facts herein stated are sworn to by the said Waterson and Meising in a complaint now on file in the United States district court for the district of Alaska, wherein Meising and Waterson are plaintiffs and E. S. Walker and L. B. Shepherd are defendants, with damages alleged therein at $25,000; and

This affiant further states that during the month of August, 1899, Judge Johnson, of the United States district court for the district of Alaska, visited Nome City, having with him at the time the clerk of his court and the assistant United States district attorney for said district; that the said district judge remained at Nome City about one week; that during his stay numerous suits were commenced over the disputed mining claims in the Cape Nome mining district; that among this number were suits by Meising and Waterson against two Laplanders; and

Affiant further says that he is informed that one Charles D. Lane, who came to the Cape Nome mining district in June or July of 1899, asserts that he has bought the aforesaid mining claims from the Laplanders, together with other contested property, and that the said Lane, in person or through his representative, is now in Washington City engaged in an attempt to make the Senate of the United States believe that he is an innocent purchaser of the said mining claims and that the passage of certain laws now pending would result seriously to his injury; and Affiant further says that the facts connected with the arrest of Waterson and Meising, as also the bringing of the suits against the Laplanders and against Walker and Shepherd, are well known at Nome City; that the attorneys for the Laplanders are Mr. Lane's attorneys, and that he must have been fully advised of the situation when he made the alleged purchase.

Affiant further says that the said L. B. Shepherd referred to in this affidavit is the same party to whom reference is made in the memorial of Charles D. Lane and the affidavits attached as having attempted to naturalize the Laplanders and other claims.

OLIVER P. HUBBARD.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 6th day of April, 1900, at Washington, D. C.

[SEAL.] BENJ. VAIL, Notary Public.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The man Shepherd, who is referred to in that affidavit, is the court commissioner in Alaska, located, I believe, at St. Michael. It was this officer who assumed that he had the authority to issue first citizens' papers to the Laplanders and others in that country. The Revised Statutes, I believe, provide that citizens' papers can be taken out only in a court of record before the judge or the clerk of the court. Therefore Mr. Shepherd had no authority whatever to make citizens of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me a question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Granting that the statement of the Senator from North Dakota be true—and it is true—that the papers must be taken out in a court or before the clerk—notwithstanding that fact, were these entries by the Laplanders made, as a matter of fact, before the other entries?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Before which entries, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. ALLEN. Before the entries of Shepherd, or whoever these other parties may be?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will come to that very shortly.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit—I will not interrupt him unnecessarily. It strikes me that the whole thing can be stated in about ten lines. When were these respective entries made? If they were made by the contestants first, and in good faith, and their claims were sought to be disturbed or jumped, as it is commonly called, by the Laplanders——

Mr. TELLER. It is the other way.

Mr. QUARLES. It is the other way.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the grantee of the Laplanders ought not to be recognized. On the other hand, if the Laplanders made a bona fide entry in the first instance, and their holdings were sold in good faith to some other person, then it becomes, it seems to me, a question of morals and of equity in its broadest sense as to what to do. Were these Lapps used as a mere cat's-paw? Is there any evidence or any contention of that kind, that they entered these lands really for the benefit of somebody else, or were the contestants used as a mere instrument to enter these lands for some other person? What are the facts in the case in those respects?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I hope I shall reach that phase of the discussion in a very short time, but before I reach it I desire to refer to the gentleman who has made the affidavit which has been read. Mr. Hubbard, as I understand, is a reputable attorney at law, having practiced in Chicago and in Indianapolis. Under the Harrison Administration, I am advised that he was the private secretary to Attorney-General Miller.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Does Mr. Hubbard deny that he is the attorney for these jumpers?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not at all. He has the right to be the attorney for anyone.

Mr. STEWART. Does he deny that he wants his lawsuit settled here and not in the courts?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not know that he denies that. I do not know that it is necessary for him to deny it.

Mr. STEWART. It is necessary for him to deny it.

Mr. TELLER. He can not very well do it after that affidavit.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Now, I refer at length to Mr. Hubbard for the simple reason that there has been an insinuation here that because he was found in my committee room there is something wrong.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon; there is no insinuation against you. The fact that there was a person in charge shows that there was an agent here trying to settle it. Of course you are not presumed to know anything about it. There is no intention to reflect upon you or anybody else. Of course we may come in contact with people who come here for crooked purposes, but it is not presumed that we know it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. An affidavit has been read at the desk to the effect that Mr. Hubbard was seen in my committee room, and it was put in a way so as to cast some reflection upon some one. Now, I only want to say that there seems to be a disposition in certain quarters to reflect upon the integrity of those who are interested in this amendment. I find in a newspaper clipping which has been sent to me an interview under date of Seattle, Wash., the 1st of April.

The interview is with one ex-United States Court Commissioner Kenneth M. Jackson. He was a court commissioner, I believe, under President Cleveland. Mr. Jackson, I am advised, is now one of the attorneys of Mr. Lane on the Pacific coast, and is associated with a man by the name of Hatch. I am also advised that Mr. Jackson is a sort of a bird of passage, and that his reputation is exceedingly shady; but I do not care to reflect upon him.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Jackson asks for legislation to help him in a lawsuit.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If the Senator will allow me to proceed——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Jackson in his interview goes on to say:

I have been informed, from what I consider a reliable source, that Senator HANSBROUGH, of Dakota, who introduced an amendment to the Alaska civil code providing that a judge must inquire into the location of mining claims in Alaska, and if he find that an alien made the location, then he must give the plaintiff a receiver or restraining order immediately, has a personal interest in claims relocated, but first located by individuals whom he calls aliens.

Now, Mr. President, I am not in the habit of denying newspaper reports. In common with many of my brother Senators, I have been very severely criticised in my political career, but here is a direct reflection by one of the attorneys who are engaged in prosecuting the case of Mr. Lane. I simply reply to it by saying that I have no interest in any of these Laplander or alien claims in Alaska, immediate or remote, direct or indirect, contingent or otherwise. That is my answer to that.

Now, Mr. President, I am advised that up to the time these aliens went into the Cape Nome district the rule in Alaska was that the size of a placer claim should be 500 feet up and down the creek or gulch. These people located that rich region about Nome, got together, as the Senator from Nevada stated, five or six of them, and made rules and regulations fixing the size of the claim at 1,320 feet up and down the creek or gulch, or 20 acres apiece. That was the first time that a claim was ever made of that size in Alaska, as I am advised.

Mr. ALLEN. What has been the ordinary size?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Five hundred feet up and down the creek or gulch.

Mr. ALLEN. Who makes this change?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The aliens who went in there and first got hold of those rich diggings.

Mr. STEWART. I beg pardon; there was but one alien. I ask if the man who declared his intention was an alien?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that 20 acres is the general rule under the United States statutes.

Mr. STEWART. That is the amount designated.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is to say, that it shall not be larger.

Mr. TELLER. Not larger than 20 acres, and six men might take out 20 acres together if they saw fit. The courts have settled this question very positively.

Mr. ALLEN. Is not that pretty large?

Mr. STEWART. That is the law.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that thoroughly, and I understand also that six men or thereabouts, most of them aliens, have taken about 2,000 acres in Alaska. Now, what are the facts in this case? In September, 1898, three men by the name of Lindbloom, Lindeberg, and Brynteson staked for themselves four claims. I am told that two of these men were not citizens. They had applied to the court commissioner for their first papers, and I understand that he had issued some sort of writing to them to the effect that they had taken out first papers.

Mr. STEWART. That was true only as to the one.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is true as to two of them.

Mr. STEWART. Two declared before the court down below before they got up there.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Then they proceeded, through alleged powers of attorney, to stake from 6 to 10 more claims on Anvil Creek alone, in all taking about 3 or 4 miles along that creek, which is considered to be the richest creek in the region. They then proceeded to Glacier Creek, where they took three claims, one each for themselves, and many others through powers of attorney; and on a gulch, the name of which I have not here now, but a tributary of Glacier Creek, they did the same thing, taking all the ground in the gulch. They did this on several creeks and gulches in that region, so that they claim that they hold from 1,000 to 2,000 acres of placer ground in that section.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator say that only two individuals did all this?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Three.

Mr. DANIEL. What is the Senator reading from, may I ask?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. From some notes that I have made.

Mr. DANIEL. Where is the evidence of that?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think the evidence that I furnish here is quite as good as the evidence the Senator from Nevada has been furnishing.

Mr. DANIEL. I think so. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. How can the Senate decide rightly a case on mere ex parte affidavits, on loose statements of attorneys, and supersede the courts of law, who can have the parties before them, cross-examine the witnesses, and settle their rights in a legal way? Does not the Senator think that it is a more appropriate method to determine a case like this in the courts of law of the country and not in a body which was not devised for that purpose?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. A portion of the amendment which I offer provides that the question of citizenship shall be considered by the court. If the Senator will examine the amendment——

Mr. DANIEL. It tells the courts how they must decide it after they have considered it. They certainly must consider it and then decide it our way.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I have stated that this took place in September, 1898.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Of course.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to know how to vote on this question, and therefore I want to know the facts. I do not care anything about deductions and conclusions. Is it possible under the existing statute for the men you have spoken of to enter 2,000 acres?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am stating what has been related to me and what I believe to be true, and which is not denied.

Mr. ALLEN. I am entirely ignorant on the subject. The Senator thinks that several thousand acres have been entered by these three individuals?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. From one to two thousand acres, I am advised.

Mr. ALLEN. Can they, under the terms of the mining laws, enter that number of acres? Is there any limit?

Mr. CARTER. I will state for the information of the Senator that any individual who is a citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such, may locate not to exceed 20 acres of placer mining ground in one location. There is no limit to the number of locations that such an individual can make.

Mr. ALLEN. Can he go from town to town, from locality to locality, and enter 20 acres where he sees fit?

Mr. CARTER. He can locate any number of claims he may desire.

Mr. STEWART. I will state in this connection that although the statute does not limit the number of claims that he may locate, the mining rules everywhere confine him to one mining district for one claim, on one creek, on one stream, on one lode. I will get the statute and read it.

Mr. CARTER. We are speaking of the condition which obtained, presumably, from the statement of the Senator from North Dakota, in the Cape Nome country at the time these locations were made; at a time when no miners' rules or regulations existed. In the absence of local rules or regulations the individual who is a citizen, or who has declared his intention to become a citizen, may locate a placer-mining claim embracing not exceeding 20 acres upon making a discovery of gold within the limits of the claim staked out.

Mr. ALLEN. Can he go a mile from that camp and stake out another?

Mr. CARTER. He can stake out 20 acres contiguous.

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. CARTER. And continue that indefinitely. There is no restraint in the laws of the United States on that subject.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to correct the Senator from Montana. He can not do it in that way.

Mr. CARTER. He can not patent the two claims together.

Mr. TELLER. Nor can he stake them contiguous, either. This is the law——

Mr. CARTER. I should like to have the Senator from Colorado cite any section of the statute which restrains it.

Mr. TELLER. I do not cite any, but I can show you a ruling of the courts on that subject. Mr. President, this is the law: Any man who discovers a placer claim and finds gold on it may take up 20 acres at that point—say, on one stream. Then he has that with the burden that he has to do certain things; he has to stake it; he has to work it; he has to put $100 worth of work on it each year, and he must keep that up until he has put $500 worth of work on the claim, and then he can get a patent.

Mr. CARTER. There is no obligation on him to take out a patent?

Mr. TELLER. He is not obliged to do it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But he is obliged to do one hundred dollars' worth of work each year.

Mr. TELLER. He may go on doing that for fifty years, if he is content, and not take out a patent.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the limit as to the number of claims?

Mr. TELLER. Under the general law there is no limit. If a man discovers on Glazier Creek a gold-bearing placer claim, he takes a claim; and if he goes over on Mesa Creek, he may take another claim if he discovers a mine there.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the mining law is more liberal than the homestead law.

Mr. TELLER. There is supposed to be some merit in the discovery of a mine, the finding where the gold is located. Then the burden is that the miner shall work the mine each year to a certain extent.

Mr. ALLEN. Should we undertake to settle disputed titles in a bill of this kind?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think we ought to legislate in a case now pending between individuals.

Mr. ALLEN. We are attempting to try the title here?

Mr. TELLER. No; we have never tried to quiet a title which has been pending in court since I have been here.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is entitled to the floor and declines to yield.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that my friends here who are versed in the law shall argue these questions after I have made a statement of facts, as I believe them to be facts. I have referred to some things that took place in September, 1898. In October of the same year came the Laplanders in the employ of the Government. They went there as herders of reindeer. They were accompanied, as I am advised, by Dr. Kittilsen, a missionary, and Mr. Rice, who, I believe, is a relative of Mr. Lane, who makes this memorial to the Senate.

These Laplanders, who went to Nome with Mr. Rice and Dr. Kittilsen, took about all the claims in that mining district. Dr. Kittilsen was made the recorder of the district. The district, I am told, was about 25 miles square. On one occasion, when miners came in at a later period and voted to reduce the size of the claims, they were intimidated and driven away.

In November, 1898, quite a number of American miners, American citizens, came along dragging their sleds over the snow and ice of that country. The Laplanders had the benefit of reindeer to bring them into the country and to drag their packs into the country, but the American citizen was obliged to drag his sled over the ice and snow by hand, and hence he did not get into the diggings until November, 1898; and when he got there he found all those mines located, the very richest of that district taken by those people, who were not citizens of the United States; and they did. Mr. President, precisely what any gentleman here would do under like circumstances. They proceeded to stake over the alien and to make locations thereon, and having staked over the alien they are contestants there to-day.

Where does Mr. Lane come in? I do not know Mr. Lane, but he has friends here on this floor. I am advised, however, that he is a very wealthy man, and, as is shown by the letter which was read here, he is taking a great deal of machinery into that country, going to build a railroad, and all that kind of business. But Mr. Lane did not get into Alaska in the year 1898. He got there in July, 1899, and he made his alleged purchases of these alien claims about October of that year.

It has been stated here that Mr. Lane spent a very large sum of money for these mining claims. Does any business man believe that he (Mr. Lane)—and he must be a business man because he has acquired great wealth—would pay a large sum of money for mining property over which there was a contest or concerning which there was a controversy in regard to the title? I do not believe that any business man in this body—and I assume there are business men here—would pay a large sum of money for a mining claim that was contested or that had been jumped.

Not only that, Mr. President, but these American citizens who came in and staked over the aliens, proceeding by legal processes, brought suit against the aliens to oust them, and those proceedings were pending at the time Mr. Lane is claimed to have bought and before he was alleged to have purchased this property. Those proceedings were pending in the courts; but when Judge Johnson came on the ground in 1899 he remained at Nome only one week and could not try the case.

Mr. President, I have every reason to believe that the facts I have stated here are correct. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] said in his remarks a little while ago that there had been no revision of the miners' rules attempted subsequent to the date that the aliens got together and made rules to govern that district. Why, sir, it was a matter of common notoriety, as everybody will tell you who has been to Nome and who was there in 1899, that the miners, the American citizens who went into that country, without reindeer or Government rations to help them in, held meetings and attempted to formulate new rules and regulations.

The American citizens who came there got together and attempted to draft rules and regulations for the governance of that district. What happened? There was a company of United States troops there under the command of Captain Walker and Lieutenant Spaulding, and those officers, with those troops behind them, broke up the meeting and drove the miners out of the building at Nome City at the point of the bayonet.

Mr. STEWART. What evidence have you of that?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It has been told me by a hundred men.

Mr. STEWART. It has been denied by dozens I have talked with.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have never heard it denied until now.

Mr. STEWART. I have; but it is immaterial one way or the other.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Very well. Mr. President, that is all I care to say on this question at this time.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator state the size of the claims? Are they 1,300 feet?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator from Colorado asks me the size of these claims. I am advised that they are 1,360 feet up and down the creek or gulch.

Mr. TELLER. How wide are they?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. They are sufficiently wide to make 20 acres. I do not know the exact width.

Mr. TELLER. It is enough to make a 20-acre claim.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yes; and up to that time the size of placer claims in Alaska had been 500 feet up and down the creek or gulch.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the Senator has such a fashion for calling those men aliens that it seems to me an alien must have injured him at some time. These Norwegians and Laplanders are very good people. I do not think they would hurt the Senator particularly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH rose.

Mr. STEWART. I am not going to say anything unkind about the honorable Senator from North Dakota; but we have got the sworn statement of the recorder, Albert N. Kittelsen, and he is a man whom his neighbors give the highest character.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, yes; but I was just going to make a few remarks about the evidence.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to correct a matter just now?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say to the Senate here and now that a great deal of prejudice is sought to be created because these men were Lapps. I want to call attention to the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson, in which he says:

> Of the party that took up claims at the mines I am informed and believe 26 were Norwegians and Finns and but 14 were Lapps.

Mr. STEWART. They took up different portions. There were not that number up there. I now read from the affidavit of Dr. Kittelsen:

> Albert N. Kittelsen, M. D., being first duly sworn, on oath says that he is a citizen of the United States, and has been a resident of the Territory of Alaska since 1896; that he arrived at Cape Nome, Alaska, about October, 1898; that prior to that time there were three men located at Cape Nome; two of them were Swedes by birth, but had been in the United States some ten to fifteen years—> the third was a Norwegian. Two other persons went there with me; one of them a Laplander and one an American citizen.

These men are called aliens—

There was only one Laplander.

> The Laplander had declared his intention to become an American citizen in the early spring of that year, and his declaration was filed before L. B. Shepherd, who was a United States commissioner at St. Michaels. The six persons who were then at Cape Nome located claims; some of them had located previous to our arrival. We then formed a mining district, and adopted rules and regulations under the laws of the United States. I was elected recorder.

There was only a pretense that one of them was an alien and that one had declared his intention to become a citizen. The other six men who were there were citizens, and there is nothing in this talk about the number of claims located and that we are trying a case that is a case for a court. We are trying a case now of a Laplander's location, whether he, having failed to declare his intention to become a citizen before the proper officer or not, although he did so declare in good faith, shall lose his claim or his grantee shall lose his claim. That is the question.

> A few weeks after that miners from the surrounding country commenced coming in, and during the following winter the number rose to between two hundred and three hundred. I recorded all their claims, and in every sense was recognized and acted as mining recorder. The first Laplander located three good claims—one for himself, one for his brother, and one for an associate, who arrived soon after and took possession and worked the claims. These Laplanders worked their claims during the working season of 1899 and sold out to Mr. Lane in the fall of 1899.

One Norwegian located claims on about six different streams, and has been in possession of them ever since.

They located a claim on each stream. They were allowed to do that, because the policy of the law is to encourage discovery, so that the discoverer might locate another vein, if they were quartz veins, or locate on another creek, it they were placer claims.

The claims of these Laplanders, while they were in possession and working them, were located by other persons called "jumpers."

Later on the claims of the Norwegian were relocated by "jumpers" and recorded by me, because it was my duty to record all claims presented for recordation. I was so instructed by the judge of the district court.

In the summer of 1899 three lawyers located themselves at Cape Nome, whose names were Hubbard, Beeman, and Hume. These relocators, although they did not take possession or work upon the claims they relocated or "jumped," employed Hubbard, Beeman & Hume as their attorneys. Mr. Hubbard, of the firm of Hubbard, Beeman & Hume, an attorney for the relocators, is in the city of Washington. I met him on the 5th of this month in the committee room of Senator HANSBROUGH.

That does not reflect upon the Senator from North Dakota, and I have no intention whatever to reflect upon the Senator. I have here a good many decisions bearing on the question in dispute. I have not time to refer to them; but the supreme court of Utah rendered a decision which I desire to read. I have before me the Pacific Reporter, volume 56, page 300—the case of Wilson et al. vs. Triumph Consolidated Mining Company—in which it is held:

1. Where a mining claim is located by an alien on unappropriated Government land, and all the acts necessary to a valid location are performed by him, and he and his representatives, claiming to be the owners thereof, perform the work necessary to keep the claim good until it is conveyed to a citizen, and no rights of third parties have attached prior to the conveyance, as between private citizens, in which the Government is not interested, the conveyance vests the title in the citizen, although the original locator was an alien.

2. A corporation organized under the laws of Utah is a citizen of the State.

3. Although it is true, as a general rule, that only citizens of the United States can locate mining claims, the question of citizenship can only be raised by the Government; and in an action of ejectment, in a contest between individuals, the question can not arise.

There are other decisions of the same character, which can be had if Senators desire them.

What Mr. Lane asks is to be let alone, not to have his property taken away from him, and not to have it taken by a case tried here on the wild statements which are made in attempting to influence it on the allegation that all the men who went there and located these claims were aliens. These allegations are all denied, and any court before whom the case should be tried would very soon sift them. Mr. Lane does not want any legislation to interfere with his claims, which are undoubtedly good. I have never known a case in the United States, where a contest is pending and where a case is in litigation, that the Senate or the Congress of the United States undertook to decide it against one party and for another.

There is another very harsh thing in the amendment of the Senator. He declares in the amendment that there shall be no locations made hereafter by an attorney or an agent. I do not object to that hereafter, but then the balance of it says that none that are already made shall be valid unless $100 worth of work shall have been done. They have, under the law, a year in which to do the $100 worth of work after the location. If the location was a valid one, the locators had a year originally or some fixed reasonable time after that when the work should be done, so that it would not be a confiscation.

Three months after the passage of this act would be a short enough limitation to say that those who had not already done work, when the law did not require it, should have their claims confiscated. There are very likely men who have induced others to go to Alaska and make locations and who have spent large sums of money in sending those men up there. Of course if you deny the right to agents to locate hereafter, that will stop such proceedings. But where that has been done in good faith I do not think we ought with a law like this destroy the property they have, after they have held it according to the laws and customs which have heretofore existed. If it was located through an agent or attorney they ought to have a reasonable time to do the work hereafter.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nevada if he holds that a man who is not a citizen of the United States, and who has not declared his intention to become such, is competent to take a mining claim, or a homestead claim, or any other claim under the Government?

Mr. STEWART. No; he is not competent to take a mining claim; but if he gets possession another man can not oust him; it is only the Government of the United States that can take advantage of that. You can not jump his claim. If you want to get him off you must get the Government to interfere. That is in accordance with the decisions of the courts right along, and it is a decent and humane policy. Our laws ought to be at least as good and as liberal as the laws of Canada; and the laws of Canada and British Columbia up to 1899 made no distinction between aliens and natives.

The only law which was different that they have passed was in 1889, when they prohibited aliens in British Columbia from locating mining claims; and I think it is time they ought to be ashamed of it, and if we should pass a law practically confiscating the property of persons who have gone there in good faith, thinking they were citizens of the United States, and give it to men who had jumped it, I think we should be ashamed of ourselves. But the Senate has never done and will never do anything of that kind.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, this is not a question of whether Mr. Lane is entitled to this property or not. He has bought these claims of some of the Laplanders or foreigners. I am going upon the theory that they are foreigners. I do not care anything about their attempt to make a title.

The statutes of the United States say that citizens of the United States may locate mining claims. The Supreme Court has decided over and over again, as did the court of appeals of the eighth circuit in a case involving at least a half million dollars, that nobody but the United States could raise that question. It has become a rule of property that is absolute.

When the Senator says that Mr. Lane bought with the knowledge that these men were aliens, he bought with the knowledge of what the Supreme Court had said the law was. He had a right to buy. He knew that unless the Attorney-General brought suit nobody in the world could raise that question, and nobody ought to be allowed to raise it except the Government of the United States itself. These men are the prior locators.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. How can the Government of the United States raise the question?

Mr. TELLER. I have no doubt they can.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But how?

Mr. TELLER. It is an old right which the Senator remembers; the alien would hold until "office found," until it was alleged that he was an alien, and when that question was raised the Government would determine it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I know; but could the United States Attorney-General bring a suit without being authorized by Congress?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know but he could, though I do not now recall any such suit brought.

Mr. STEWART. He has brought a good many suits of a similar character.

Mr. TELLER. Not in regard to citizenship, I think. I do not recall any suit upon the question of citizenship.

Mr. STEWART. But as to the want of title.

Mr. TELLER. Sometimes the Attorney-General has brought suits because title has been got in fraud of the law; but it has never been regarded that an alien could take the benefit of a fraud of the law. The policy of the law was to open this country to settlement; and it has always been presumed for hundreds of years, not only in this country but in others, that the men who took from the earth gold and silver were public benefactors; and privileges have been held out to them, as was the case under the Spanish law and under our law, as a reward for the discovery of a mine containing precious metals.

Every man for many years who has discovered such a claim was entitled to take twice as much out of it as any man who came after him. That was a measure of reward to him; and so the Government of the United States has quietly allowed foreigners to take claims; and the Supreme Court of the United States has, as I have said, repeatedly held that that is not a controversy that can be settled between a citizen and an alien.

These men took up not only these claims, but many others. At least sixty or seventy of these Laplanders were up there, and I am informed, upon what I regard as good authority, that they are the men who opened up that rich country, the men who went in there and found gold; and perhaps it would never have been found if they had not gone there. They have taken these claims under the decisions of the courts, and they have a right to take them, subject to the right of the Government of the United States to take proceedings against them. Is it possible that the Senate of the United States is going to settle a controversy which an affidavit here presented shows is now in court? Are we competent to settle these questions? Shall we determine as to questions of justice between these men?

I have lived in a mining country for nearly forty years, and of all the contemptible creatures who ever saw the light of the sun it is the man who jumps another man's claim. You take the common, honest miner, and he looks to see who is the first man who puts a spade in the ground, who is the first man that uncovered it, who has brought the mineral to light, and who has shown to the world that it is a valuable thing to hold. If you can show to a jury that any man is a jumper, they will decide against him. In ninety-nine cases out of a humdred where a claim is jumped it is done for the purpose of blackmailing the original holder, to see if some defect can be found in his title.

I have an innate prejudice from long experience against the man who attempts to take the holdings of another; and the evidence here from the Senator himself who is advocating this shows that these people went in there; and what did they do? They simply, I suppose, went into the recorder's office and filed a claim on it, as I have known hundreds of men to do for the purpose of instituting a contest and securing a compromise. Yet men come here and ask us to act with the affidavit of this man Hubbard here showing that a suit is now pending to determine this question. Why should we interfere? Why should we make a rule that shall apply to these poor Laplanders that does not apply to everybody else? Why should we change the law of property—we who know nothing about the facts—not affecting Mr. Lane alone, but affecting every man who has taken a piece of property, affecting hundreds of others perhaps who have bought from foreigners, citizens of the United States, who are entitled to the protection of the laws?

Mr. President, this is an unheard of proposition. I never supposed until Saturday that the amendment included any such proposition. I had never read the amendment. I am willing, if the law is not strict enough, that it shall be made more strict with reference to the future and other appropriations of mining lands, but I am not willing to change the law that now exists and disturb the title of nobody knows who or how many people in the United States. The curse of the mining country has been the litigation we have had for many years. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] says to me that it affects the district of Alaska alone. It does not make any difference that it pertains to the district of Alaska alone. If these men have gone in there and done what they ought not to have done, the courts will settle the question.

The courts have been settling such questions for forty years, and there has grown up a class of law with which lawyers who have not practiced in a mining country are unfamiliar; but the court up there will be familiar with it, and the court will do justice between these people. If these people have taken what they are not entitled to take—that is, if they have taken more claims—the court will say, "You have taken too many." If they have taken what the law allows, they are the owners of them, and we can not take them away. We can embarrass them, we can disturb them, we can distress them, and we can destroy them, for that is what it means, although we may not have the legal power to do it. We can create such a condition as will make that property valueless to them. I am speaking not of Mr. Lane—he will take care of himself. I am speaking of the people who are not here in any shape and have not been heard of—the miner, the Laplander who is holding under his supposed citizenship.

Mr. STEWART. And the Norwegian.

Mr. TELLER. Or the Norwegian or anyone else, holding under a decision of the Supreme Court of many years' standing that nobody but the great Government of the United States can be heard to question his title.

Mr. President, thousands of dollars are put by these foreign miners into claims, and when they want to get a patent they are obliged to be citizens, and then they make their citizenship by the time they get ready for a patent. There is nothing for us to do but to let this thing alone—absolutely alone. It would be criminal for us to attempt here to pass on the rights of these people. I am astonished that it should find any support here whatever, and I do not believe it will find very much when the vote is taken.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. CARTER obtained the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CARTER. I will yield for a moment to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am desirous of submitting to the Senate at an early moment some remarks with reference to a very peaceful subject—that of the Government Naval Observatory in Georgetown. I shall be prepared to speak at any time. Whenever the debate lags upon the pending amendment to the Alaska bill, or on any other bill that may be before the Senate, I will endeavor to slip in my remarks.

Mr. CARTER. There has been no evidence of lagging on the part of this debate. I was about to move that the Senate adjourn.

POLICY RESPECTING THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Montana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to give notice that on Tuesday, April 17, a week from to-morrow, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I will submit to the Senate some remarks upon the Philippine question, either upon the bill now before the Senate or some one of the resolutions pending.

MINNESOTA AND MANITOBA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. NELSON. I ask the Senator from Montana to yield to me.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota for a moment.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8876) granting the right of way to the Minnesota and Manitoba Railroad Company across the ceded portion of the Chippewa (Red Lake) Indian Reservation, in Minnesota.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 10, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 9, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

REARMING THE NATIONAL GUARD.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10508) for the rearming of the National Guard, and the same was referred to the Committee on Militia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ESCH, for ten days, on account of important business.

PRINTING OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House concurrent resolution 29.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, chairman of the Committee on Printing, by direction of that committee calls up the following resolution and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed in black cloth binding and wrapped for mailing 5,000 copies of the national banking laws for the use of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I have a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho submits the following privileged resolution.

The resolution as amended by the Committee on the Public Lands was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives as to the number of acres now included within forest reserves belonging to land-grant railroad companies or other corporations or individuals at the time of the creation of said forest reserves; and also the amount of so-called forest-reserve lieu scrip, or of right of lieu location, which has been issued therefor or for which claims are pending; and also what new forest reserves and extensions to existing reserves are in contemplation, or have been recommended, and by whom requested or recommended, and where located; also the amount of railroad land or other grants included in such proposed new reserves or extensions; and also the number of acres which have been located by said so-called forest-reserve scrip or right of lieu location and where located.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Lands. The information which is called for is desired from the Secretary of the Interior, in order that the Committee on Public Lands may have information sufficient to enable them to frame legislation affecting forest reserves.

The act of June 4, 1897, which was a general appropriation act, unfortunately contained a provision authorizing the settler or owner of a tract included within a forest reservation to relinquish the same to the United States and to select in lieu thereof other vacant, unoccupied land belonging to the Government.

The intention of Congress was, manifestly, to allow a settler whose claim might be included within a forest reserve to take another claim or homestead in lieu thereof, if he so desired.

Forest reserves in the Rocky Mountain States had been created in the early spring of 1897, embracing many millions of acres. Other reserves were created after the passage of this act. The Department of the Interior construes this act to apply to lands granted to railroad companies as well as to individual settlers, and to authorize said railroad companies to relinquish their lands included within forest reserves and take other lands in lieu thereof, whether surveyed or unsurveyed. This right is held to be assignable.

The effect of this legislation is therefore to permit land-grant railroad companies to exchange land of little or no value, in many instances, for land of very great value, provided a forest reserve has been made to include lands granted to the company. This right of lieu location has become valuable, being worth, as I am informed, as much as $5 an acre, while the land which was exchanged for it was not worth, on an average, more than 50 cents an acre. The result of this exchange is therefore very profitable to the land-grant companies.

In the State of Idaho, which I have the honor to represent in this House, forest reserves have been created, or are proposed, which will include within their limits lands heretofore granted to railroad companies to the amount of 800,000 acres. These lands are not worth to exceed 50 cents per acre, or $400,000. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company will be entitled to receive lieu forest-reserve scrip, or right of lieu location, for this land, which has a market value of $5 per acre. The exchange, therefore, to this one company in this one State is worth $3,600,000. The people of Idaho have never asked that any of these reserves be created. On the contrary, many of them have protested against their creation, and their representatives have verbally and in writing protested against such creation.

There is a proposition now pending in the General Land Office for the creation of new reserves which will include 500,000 acres of railroad land. There is a further proposition pending for the creation of a reserve which will include the county of Washington and parts of Boise, Ada, and Canyon counties, in said State. This proposed reserve will include within its limits more than 100 schoolhouses, 3 towns of more than 1,500 people each, $4,000,000 worth of assessable property, and a population of many thousands of people. Four-fifths of the area within that proposed reserve is entirely devoid of timber. The creation of this reserve can work no possible good purpose and would do infinite harm to the people there. It would reserve all the land from homestead settlement or any entry except mineral entry.

It would prevent the grazing of sheep on the public lands within such reserve. In fact, it would practically stop all improvement or advancement of the section in question. The people do not want this reserve and their representatives have protested against it. Notwithstanding all this, a representative of the Interior Department has recommended its creation, and the same is now being considered by the Department.

The figures I have given as to the area of forest reserves and proposed reserves in Idaho, together with the railroad lands therein, are reliable, having been obtained by me from the General Land Office.

The information asked for in this resolution is absolutely essential in order to enable the Committee on Public Lands to prepare proper legislation to correct this great evil. The resolution as originally introduced by me has been slightly modified, and has thus been unanimously reported from the committee. I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON of Idaho, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PENSIONS TO MEXICAN SOLDIERS.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6959) to amend an act approved January 5, 1893, entitled "An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," so as to extend the provisions of said act to all Mexican soldiers pensionable under law.

The bill was read, as follows;

Be it enacted, etc., That the benefits of an act approved January 5, 1893, entitled "An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," and which granted an increase from $8 to $12 per month to all those who were then on the pension roll, be, and the same is hereby, extended so as to include all Mexican soldiers who are pensionable under the laws, irrespective of the time that they may or may not have been upon the roll.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on Pensions were read:

Change the title so as to read:

"A bill to extend the provisions of an act entitled 'An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases,' approved January 5, 1893."

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following:

"That the benefits of the act entitled 'An act granting an increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases,' approved January 5, 1893, be, and they are hereby, extended to all survivors of the Mexican war who are pensionable under existing Mexican war service pension laws, and who have become, or may hereafter become, wholly disabled for manual labor and in such destitute circumstances that $8 per month are insufficient to provide them the necessaries of life, irrespective of the date of the granting of the said service pension."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman just what the bill does—what is the effect of it?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I will say to the gentleman that in 1893 this Congress passed an act increasing the pensions of all indigent Mexican soldiers who were then on the rolls from $8 to $12 per month. That act created a class, and what called it to my attention was the fact that a Mexican soldier in my district, whose claim for a pension was pending before the passage of the act of 1893, but whose certificate was issued just after the passage of that act, is cut off from the benefits of that act. There is no reason why any distinction should be made between indigent Mexican pensioners, and I therefore introduced this bill to remove that distinction and to grant to all indigent Mexican soldiers equal pensions, as should have been done by the act of 1893. There are comparatively few of these Mexican soldiers——

Mr. PAYNE. Then I understand that the act of 1893 gave an increase of pensions from $8 to $12 a month to soldiers of the Mexican war who were then pensioned, in certain cases, where they were disabled.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Yes; who were then on the rolls.

Mr. PAYNE. Where they were totally disabled.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Where they were totally disabled or incapacitated from earning a living, etc., and were then on the rolls.

Mr. PAYNE. And some names have been placed on the rolls since at $8 a month, and this proposes to put them in the same class, under the law of 1893?

Mr. SNODGRASS. Yes.

Mr. COX. I should like to ask my colleague one question. Is that act broad enough to cover the widows of Mexican soldiers?

Mr. SNODGRASS. No, sir.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. It just puts those Mexican soldiers who have been pensioned since 1893 on an equality with those who were pensioned before 1893.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. I think the bill is absolutely right, except it ought to be $12.

Mr. SNODGRASS. It is $12.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment to the title will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SNODGRASS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an agreement with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], representing the minority of the committee, on the length of general debate. What suggestion has the gentleman to make?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I think I will probably be able to yield some of the time back to the House; but from the requests I have had, I will ask for three hours upon this side; and I will also ask that gentlemen who speak be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD, which may save time to the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For myself, I have no objection to any gentleman extending his remarks in the RECORD. I would suggest to the gentleman that we close debate at 5 o'clock. I am not going to occupy any time myself more than five minutes; I prefer to explain the bill under the five-minute rule, as we read it by sections.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I expect debate will be closed at 5 o'clock, but I have received a good many requests, and amongst others some from gentlemen that I do not see in their seats now. It may be possible that they will not be here, but as little time as I can afford to take on this side by an agreement now would be three hours; but if we take on this side three hours, and you take less over there, we will get through with general debate by 5 o'clock. But I would not be willing to agree to less than three hours. I think the probabilities are that a part of the time I ask will be given back to the House, but I can not make an agreement for less than three hours.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suggest to the gentleman that general debate be closed at 1 o'clock to-morrow, unless sooner closed by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Would that give us the morning hour, or would we get from 12 to 1 o'clock for debate?

The SPEAKER. There is no morning hour unless it is called for.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That will give us our three hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate close to-morrow at 1 o'clock, unless by unanimous consent it is closed sooner; and that of that time three hours be given to the side of the minority.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And that gentlemen who speak have consent to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. Also that gentlemen speaking on the bill may extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. O'GRADY in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, this is the usual appropriation bill for the maintenance of the Agricultural Department. There is no new legislation in the bill, except one item—extending leave of absence to employees of the Weather Bureau and the Bureau of Animal Industry outside the city of Washington. The other changes are simply changes in the wording in the different paragraphs under which the lump-sum appropriations are to be expended. The bill presented, according to the report, is $390,778 in excess of the appropriation for the last fiscal year, which shows an increase of about 12 per cent. The main item of increase is $40,000 additional allowed by the committee for the distribution of free seeds.

I am sorry to say that was asked for by a petition of 225 members of this House, and the committee conceded it. There is an addition of $60,000 to the Weather Bureau, part of which is to provide for the erection of iron storm-signal towers and a part of which is to meet the increased cost of paper and other material used in that Bureau. Another increase of $38,000 is allowed for the purpose of purchasing a new quarantine station at the harbor of New York, the present one having to be abandoned on account of opening the streets of the town through it. Another increase is for the erection of a new laboratory at Washington.

The Agricultural Department is at present paying $10,000 a year rent for additional service in outside buildings which are used as laboratories. Ten thousand dollars would be 5 per cent of the cost of a new laboratory. The committee, looking at it as a business proposition, thought it would be far better for the Government to own the building. There is another increase of $5,000 in the Bureau of Agrostology to carry on, in a more practical and extended manner, the introduction and distribution of roots and seed of valuable pasture and forage plants and grasses for experimental purposes in the various sections of the United States. The amount carried for the Weather Bureau is $1,057,620, which is about the same as last year.

Now, with that brief explanation of the main features of the bill, I prefer to take it up by sections when we come to read it under the five-minute rule and answer any question that may be asked.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is anything involved in this bill concerning the civil pension list?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not a thing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Where shall I find that provision that the leave of absence shall be extended to the employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the division of salaries and expenses of the Bureau of Animal Industry.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand that the general law provides that under the regulations of the Executive Departments in Washington the Government employees shall have thirty days' vacation and in addition a sick leave of thirty days in the year, and which is generally taken, and that the vacation leave is to be extended to the Agricultural Department, but limited to fifteen days as to the agricultural employees outside of Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is limited to two weeks' vacation, and applies only to employees outside of the city of Washington. The employees within the city come within the general law. We have put in an amendment applying it to the employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry outside of the city of Washington.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think there is nothing unreasonable about that, but I think there is as to the manner in which the vacation, or rather the sick leave, is availed of here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That can not be corrected here. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman has evidenced that by the provision in this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The climatic conditions are not so severe outside of the city, and a great deal of the labor of the employees outside of the city of Washington is done in the open air.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And yet Washington has always been lauded as a salubrious climate.

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any contention here in regard to any particular item in the bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think there is the slightest. We agree upon all points. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I think will confirm me in that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The committee is unanimous upon the bill.

Mr. TALBERT. I thought there might be some particular item about which the committee were divided, and I would like to know what it was in the beginning.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; we are the most unanimous body of farmers you ever saw. [Laughter.]

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if there is any provision in it by which the use of vaccine matter may be continued?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no provision in the bill to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from pursuing the policy he is now pursuing.

Mr. LLOYD. Does he pursue the policy he is now pursuing under a specific act?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the general powers granted him by the bill cover that.

Mr. LLOYD. And the general officers of the Department perform the work, and he does not need any specific appropriation for vaccine matter?

Mr. WADSWORTH. He does not. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] forty-five minutes.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I desire the Clerk to read in my time the following beautiful poetic tribute to the indefatigable zeal of the members of the House in supplying their constituents with things other than their speeches.

I think the House will agree with me after hearing it read that this constituent of mine, Mr. W. H. Settle, the author, who resides in Madisonville, Hamilton County, Ohio, and who is a free-silver, simon-pure Democrat, who knows he is a Democrat, who has voted the Democratic ticket all his life, and who is a splendid fellow, ought to be nominated for Vice-President on some one of the Democratic national tickets.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SEEDS THAT NEVER GROW.

I nearly hate the thought of spring,
With its delightful sun,
For well I know the mail will bring
A pack from Washington;
A little package, duly franked,
No postage stamps to show,
And it contains those little seeds—
The kind that never grow.

Our good and zealous Congressman,
Remindful of our vote,
Upon his memorandum's page
Puts down a little note,
And when the proper time arrives
For us to wield the hoe,
He sendeth us the little seeds—
The ones that never grow.

There're squashes with enticing names,
And cabbages, I wot,
So large that you would think that one
Would shade a garden spot;
So with the pack from Washington
You amble forth to sow,
With many a drop of sweat, the seeds
That never care to grow.

How often have I plied the rake;
How oft I've lounged about,
With eyes alert to catch the first
Signs of the coming sprout;
In vain, in vain, my hopes have fled,
My heart has filled with woe,
Above the seeds from Washington—
The seeds that never grow.

But yet each year my hopes revive,
As spring reclothes the tree,
And to my homestead surely comes
The package marked "M. C.;"
And, foolish-like, again I wield
The sprinkler and the hoe,
And, like a ninny, plant the seeds
That never care to grow.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio if that is the kind of seeds he has been sending out? [Laughter.]

Mr. SHATTUC. I never sent this Democrat any. He got them from other Democrats from other sections of the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman if they did not grow?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; mine grew. He is referring to Democratic seeds. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is the Republican policy to give the Democrats poor seeds?

Mr. SHATTUC. Oh, I would cut off the Democratic seed entirely, in all directions, if I could. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the problem now confronting this country in the Philippines particularly, and in our other island acquisitions generally, is not beyond the solution of the wisdom and the statesmanship of the Republican party and the patriotism of the American people.

Graver problems have been solved by the party now in power and deservedly enjoying the confidence of the people—problems, sir, which had to deal with the treatment of high-spirited and brave, though misguided, millions of our own fellow-citizens, exceeding numerically the population of the Philippine Islands and bound to us by the ties of consanguinity, of common inheritance, and of inseparable destiny.

Then, as now, efforts were made and obstacles were raised to embarrass the Government in the enforcement of its delegated powers, the dignity of its sovereignty, and the maintenance of that authority which can alone preserve domestic tranquillity and secure the respect of the world.

It is as true as it is epigrammatical, in the issues now confronting us and which divide us from our opponents, that "history repeats itself," for along precisely the same lines the Democracy of to-day, as in the sixties, conduct their warfare on the legislation and policy of the Republican party.

If, after more than four years of the greatest civil war in history, the Republican party emerged not only triumphant in the vindication of the principles at issue, but, of equal importance to posterity, so preserved the Union of the fathers, which was sought to be disrupted, that the sons of the rebels of the sixties led the advance of our storming columns and charging lines in Cuba, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines, what great or insolvable problem lies in the Orient and affecting the future of an inferior race which warrants the impeachment of the wise policy and tried statesmanship of the Republican party? [Applause.]

In the uniforms of their fathers' foes the sons of the Southland, with the gallantry of their race, followed the flag of the Republic from Santiago to Manila. Nay! Many of the surviving veterans of Lee and Jackson, from private soldier to major-general, bivouacked on the hill of San Juan and in the rice fields of Luzon with the veterans of Grant and Sherman. Does it lie in the record of our opponents to successfully impeach before the American people the party and the policy which, while preserving the Union in a sanguinary war, has restored not alone tranquillity, peace, and prosperity to all sections of the Republic, but by its far-seeing legislation, its conspicuous humanity, its broad patriotism, and its love of justice and of country made a patriot of the rebel and a standard bearer of his son? [Great applause.]

Representatives of a loyal people on the floor of this House thirty-five years ago led armed treason and sought the life of the Republic; and I but voice the universal sentiment of a united country when I thank God that they have lived long enough to give sons to the military service of the United States, and some of them themselves become the heroic leaders of our brave soldiers on the battlefields of Cuba and the Philippines. And, sir, what prophet or the son of a prophet, though he bore a commission franked by Heaven itself, would be believed did he predict within the memory of many of us, and now within the knowledge of all, that these things would come to pass in a little over three decades after the Confederacy of the South struck its flag and the battle flags of the North were triumphantly furled? [Continued applause.]

In a little over a year we are accused of failing to accomplish that which Spain could not effect in three centuries. Imaginary obstacles are presented by our opponents as they were presented at the close of the civil war. Dire predictions are made now, as they were made then, to our successful solution of the problems confronting the Government.

Every experimental effort to gauge our difficulties is hailed with derision and pronounced a failure before trial. Every improvement on experimental policy to meet unforeseen or new conditions is loudly proclaimed a change of front, and sinister motives are ascribed as the cause; and thus it was in the period of reconstruction. Mistakes were made in details, but the general plan was the perfection of a sagacious statesmanship, which resulted in the lasting unification of the Republic.

I hold that since the commencement of our war with Spain, if we have made a mistake in the details of our policy, it was in making declarations for the future, as in the entirely superfluous and uncalled-for announcement of a policy in reference to the island of Cuba. Puerto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippine Islands are not the personal property of any political party, to be capriciously given away, exchanged, or erected into independent States by the declarations and pronunciamentos of individuals, however desirable it may seem to shorten the responsibility intrusted to us. These colonies are the wards of the American people, and the civilized world is entitled to expect that this nation will rise to the dignity of the great trust imposed upon it by, I solemnly believe, the interposition of Providence, and that we will not dishonor humanity by adopting the selfish and inhuman course of making a matter of mercantile traffic of millions of souls.

The conscience, the hearts, and the convictions of the American people rebel against the cowardly abandonment of these people and these islands until our great mission has been fulfilled. That mission, Mr. Chairman, I believe the future will disclose, and that no anticipatory speculations as to its full purport is within the compass, the knowledge, or the certainty of the present hour. We must be guided by and follow the development of events in Cuba, in Puerto Rico, and in the archipelago. One session of Congress did not effect the reconstruction of the revolted States of this Union; enactment after enactment and session after session of Congress were occupied in perfecting the measure so dear to the hearts of all—a united country. But from the inception of the Republican programme of one people, one flag, the Democracy then, as now, fought every step of progress, every inch of ground, and fell in its last intrenchment when the tocsin of war sounded from the North and the South, the East and the West, to fight a monarchical foe oppressing our neighboring people of the island of Cuba. [Great applause.]

Having zealously advocated the late war with Spain, no sooner was it over, or, indeed, fairly started, than the old policy of our opponents manifested itself in opposition to an issue which of right ought to be a national instead of the partisan question the blind fatuity of the Democracy has made it.

Imperialism is the intentional crime we are accused of being ready to commit; bad faith with Puerto Rico and with Cuba is alleged; and while our soldiers are being shot down by armed insurgents in the Philippines, so-called anti-imperialistic societies are publishing and circulating inflammatory, treasonable, and untruthful libels upon their Government and country. While brave men are falling in the enforcement of law and order and while the armed enemies of the Government of the United States defy its authority, men like Edward Atkinson and "aithers of his ilk" are engaged in the treasonable propaganda of libelous literature, under the protection of the flag our soldiers are heroically maintaining the supremacy of in the Philippines.

The question of the future disposition, government, or status of these islands do not enter at this time into the issue at stake. That issue is simply and wholly, shall the armed enemies of the United States be permitted or encouraged to defy its authority in the Philippines? And if in the Philippines, why not elsewhere? The future of these islands and their political status will be determined further along. Then, and not until then, should their status be made an issue or a question of rival policy. At present the great question confronting us is the supremacy of the Government of the United States in those islands.

Men may honestly and parties rightfully differ on expansion and anti-expansion, but I hold, Mr. Chairman, that discussion of that subject at the present time is designedly premature and is for the sole purpose of party capital. No declaration has or ought to be made, in my opinion, by the Republican party outlining its policy toward these islands until the process of development now going on shows us the wisest course to pursue with a view to the paramount interest of the United States. This is the first and essentially the paramount duty of the Government—to subserve the interests of this country and the welfare of our own people. We shall act toward others in that generous and just spirit, and with that helping hand the Republic has ever extended to the unfortunate and the distressed; but it is very properly, I think, regarded in the domain of practical statesmanship that to subserve the interests of one's own country is the highest and first duty of the legislator and patriot. [Applause.]

On this platform there ought not to be any division in this House, however we may disagree on the treatment or disposition of other peoples, when we reach that issue or question. I am perfectly content to leave the settlement of the future of the possessions which have lately fallen to us through the war with Spain to the future, as in this, like all other problems of governmental affairs, the developments as they occur will be met by suitable and appropriate legislation in harmony with the genius of our country and the spirit of a free people.

The assumption is as unfounded and unjust as the charge is dishonest and untruthful, that the Republican party stands for imperialism or any other ism detrimental to the interests of the United States or representing disloyalty to its flag. We are for the enforcement of law and order in Luzon and the suppression of anarchy and murder there, as well as in the States of the Union. The American people will not tolerate an Aguinaldo when they execute a Parsons; they will not condone in Manila what they punish in Chicago. Riot, murder, and hostility to constituted authority calls for either the abolition of government or the suppression of the malefactor. [Applause.]

The American people will trust the solution of this colonial problem to the party which preserved civil liberty, a republican form of government, and destroyed the slave oligarchy of the South, giving civil and religious liberty to millions of human beings, whom it has raised to the dignity and responsibility of citizenship.

The anti-imperialistic literature, emanating principally from a coterie of New England self-constituted guardians of a republican form of government, at the head of which, as high priest and prophet, is one Edward Atkinson, former superintendent of a Massachusetts cotton mill, and celebrated as the notorious author of the Science of Nutrition and the inventor of the Aladdin oven.

Descended from the Atkinsons of the Revolution, on the wrong side of which his loyal ancesters fought, bled, and held office, he poses before the American people as their guide and conscience in dealing with the natives of the Philippines. Theodore, senior, and Theodore, junior, of the Revolutionary period, were Atkinsons whose names became as infamous to the patriot colonists as the present Edward's is to the patriotic people of to-day. The former refused to surrender to the provincial congress of New Hampshire the records and papers of his office as chief judge of the superior court, and his worthy son, who was secretary of the colony, was the first husband of the notorious Wentworth woman, who married Sir John, governor of the colony, two weeks after the demise of Theodore, junior.

Edward Atkinson, LL. D. and Ph. D., inventor of the Aladdin oven and the workingmen's dinner pail, still keeps up the connection with the de-cendants of his expatriated Tory ancestors and friends, for, in speaking of his celebrated oven, he says:

> One of my friends in England, in a great ancestral hall, roasts his own pheasants, venison, and 4-year-old grass mutton in my Aladdin oven instead of in the old way of on a spit before a grate fire.

But it was not for the purpose of simplifying the cooking of pheasants, venison, and 4-year-old grass mutton that Edward Atkinson invented the Aladdin oven. Here is the account he himself gives of this stupendous and revolutionary invention in social economy. Mr. Atkinson says:

> I was a cotton factory superintendent, and I noticed the dinner pails of the employees and the mess of indigestible food their pails contained, and I marveled if the stomach of an ostrich could digest so much food.

From this cogitation the genius of invention seized him in a firm grasp, and he says:

> I devoted my spare time to the study of pecuniary or social economy.

"And the mountain labored and brought forth a mouse," or rather a pair of mice, for Mr. Atkinson not only invented the Aladdin oven, but the workman's dinner pail. In the design of this universe the great Creator of all placed the first man and woman in paradise, and surrounded them with every delight and luxury his infinite mind could conceive. Nor did He think man was deserving of a less delightful and charming existence. Even after his fall man was given the earth for his sustenance and the luxuries his own labor could secure. [Great applause.]

It remained for this Massachusetts pecuniary and social philosopher to discover that man—that is, the working men and women—were eating too much, at least one thousand million dollars' worth per annum more than was necessary to sustain life and work in cotton mills, factories, and mines. Hence, after the manner of the Chinese, Mr. Atkinson first addressed himself to the discovery of a "patent fuel." The Chinese for ages mixed coal dust with clay and bitumen, and in England the poor people mixed the refuse of the mouths of the pits with sand, marl, clay, and sawdust, but Mr. Atkinson wanted something which would give out less heat and cost less for his dear workingmen. He therefore addressed himself to chemical physics, studied Bunsen's Gasometry and Miller's Chemistry. The Aladdin oven and the workman's dinner pail, the latter with a lamp attachment, after the pattern of those found at Tarsus, Pompeii, and Herculaneum, were the result. When the created articles first greeted his longing eyes he thus soliloquized—I quote from Mr. Atkinson's Science of Nutrition:

> What does this man mean? Does he himself more than half believe what he says? And to that question my answer might be, "I doubt if he does."

[Laughter.]

There is the modesty of genius for you; he doubts and only half believes what he says and what he claims for his inventions, notwithstanding that he beholds them in all their completed beauty. Further along he has another spasm, and he says:

> Why, that is so simple that nobody but a fool would ever have thought of it.

And he adds:

> That is about the aspect in which the Aladdin oven and workman's pail are presented to my alter ego.

[Laughter.]

Having perfected his social and pecuniary economical utensils, he startled the world—that is, Boston—with the announcement that by the use of his Aladdin's oven and workman's dinner pail any and every hard-working man and woman could live on twelve and a half cents a day! Employers of cotton mills and factory operators cocked their ears to the welcome information and mentally calculated that if their employees could live on less than a dollar a week it would be a pure waste of money to continue paying the wages then prevailing. And so thought Edward Atkinson, LL. D. and Ph. D. Hear him:

> I could live well on $1 per week.

[Laughter.]

But the workingmen, sad to state, repudiated his philanthropic intentions and were rude enough, as quoted in his book, to greet him, their benefactor, with such expressions as "We don't want your bone soup nor your pig wash." [Great applause.]

The pecuniary economist was compelled, perforce, to turn to the women, who, he rightly concluded, were more impressionable in things savoring of domestic and household economy. After he had lectured in all the cheap halls and female institutes he could find, and after he had given exhibitions with his Aladdin oven and workman's dinner pail to exclusive lady audiences, he felt encouraged and that the reward of meritorious labors for the good of humanity was not denied him by the softer sex, for he says—I quote from Mr. Atkinson's Science of Nutrition:

> I suppose everyone has a mission, whether conscious or unconscious of it. My own mission appears to be to overcome the inertia of woman.

As superintendent of the cotton mill, no doubt Mr. Atkinson exercised his mission in overcoming the inertia of the female employees, for whose special benefit he published the following bill of fare. It is intended for six persons, and only to be eaten at midday:

	Cents.
Sicilian lentel soup	1
Three-fourths of a pound vegetables, chopped fine	3
1 pound of the nape of halibut	6
Potatoes and skimmed milk and salt	1
Entrée, breast of lamb, 1 pound	5
Rice, one-eighth of a pound	1
Curry powder	1
Dessert, bread and butter pudding	5
Brown and table bread	2
One cup of tea or coffee to each person	6
Total	30

Or just 5 cents each for the midday meal. [Laughter.]

His diary for thirty days' sustenance for an adult workingman, using his Aladdin oven and workman's dinner pail (page 171, Science of Nutrition; Edward Atkinson, author), is just $2.99, without extras, or 12½ cents per day with extras.

In one of his lectures he tells his lady auditors that—I quote from Mr. Atkinson's Science of Nutrition:

> I have imported from Egypt the small red lentil, of which Esau's mess of pottage purports to have been made.

The girls in the cotton factory who participated in the 5-cent dinner were as impressed as the princess in the story of Aladdin and his wonderful lamp.

This time, Mr. Chairman, I quote from "Aladdin's Lamp," and not from Atkinson's Aladdin oven:

> At the extraordinary manner in which the sumptuous repast was obtained the princess could not conceal her astonishment—

And if the cotton factory operatives were not equally astonished, surely Mr. Atkinson's office boy must have been semi-paralyzed, as Mr. Atkinson says:

> One day I told him to prepare just a dinner of five courses for ten people—

And he adds the extraordinary fact that, while the office boy could not tell a lentil from a head of cabbage and had never before cooked even a potato, he got the dinner of five courses ready on time with the aid of Mr. Atkinson's wonderful Aladdin oven—not lamp.

Bills of fare for seven days, 21 meals, containing, he says, "all the requisite elements for nutrition for a workingman, should cost but $1, or at the very furthest $1.50 per week," and this to include fuel and tea or coffee!

Why, Mr. Chairman, if Aguinaldo and his Filipino followers were made acquainted with Mr. Atkinson's Science of Nutrition they would be much more encouraged to hold out in their rebellion than they ever have been by his anti-imperialistic and treasonable literature, for the Science of Nutrition would teach them something practical—how to live on wind and husband their resources with a view of wearing out the overfed (vide Atkinson) soldiers who are pursuing them. [Laughter.]

It is inconceivable, sir, to a plain man like myself how this individual, however expert, studious, and scientific, either in the invention of fuel-saving ovens or in the doctrine of nutrition for workmen, can command the attention of any considerable number of people with sound common sense. But I hold now more than ever to a conviction based on observation, that of all asses the literary one has the loudest and the most sonorous bray. [Great applause.]

What weight should be attached to the inflammatory literature of a writer and a student who, after years of study in the science of social economy, declares that a hard-working, honest toiler can live on a dollar a week, when that writer assails the policy of his Government, impugns its motives, accuses it of attempting to subvert liberty, assumes and charges his assumptions as the intentions of the Government to establish an imperialistic dynasty, and incites the armed enemies of the Republic to defy its authority, I shall leave to the common sense of the country to determine, conscious that the verdict will be in his Philippine misrepresentations what it was in his wonderful Aladdin oven and workman's dinner pail—a chimerical, wild, and visionary scheme for the subversion of the natural appetite and a substitution in its stead of the bill of fare in the Science of Nutrition, Edward Atkinson, author. [Great applause.]

The cultured author of the Science of Nutrition resents as a personal affront the return or refusal of his disloyal publications. His enmity and ire, notwithstanding his titles of doctor of law and philosophy are easily aroused, as I have the pleasure of recalling in the matter of some personal correspondence which passed between us. Edward Atkinson, esq., author of the Science of Nutrition, the inventor of the Aladdin oven and workman's dinner pail, toplofically propounded this query: "Who is this man SHATTUC?" [Laughter and applause.]

Perhaps it was expected of me by Mr. Atkinson to confess my insignificance in comparison with the inventor of the Aladdin oven and workman's dinner pail, and acknowledge that "SHATTUC" was unknown in those circles the members of which boast of their loyal (British) colonial descent and refer to their "friends in England who occupy ancestral halls," but I did not do either. On the contrary, I undertook to find out who this man Atkinson is. [Laughter and applause.]

I present the information to the House and to my constituents, who he has been flooding with his visionary grievances. Whether the latter have also been treated to his pamphlets and essays on the Science of Nutrition I know not, but I am reasonably certain that the workingman element, at least, have no more use for his Aladdin oven and his dinner pail than they have respect for or confidence in any statement emanating from a source which asserts that a hard-working man can live on a dollar a week. [Long-continued applause.]

Mr. Chairman, touching the correspondence to which I have referred, I will read the same as explanatory to my remarks:

ATKINSON TO SHATTUC.

BOSTON, August 15, 1899.

DEAR SIR: A copy of the Anti-Imperialist returned to me with this indorsement—

"Respectfully returned. Take my name off your list. I am no traitor to my country"— has been received. I am very glad to have the information that you are not a traitor. Had you been, I should have taken your name off the list of members of Congress, to all of whom my pamphlets in support of Senator HOAR and others are sent. I may add that since we may assume that you do not support the opponents of criminal aggression, our effort to take your name off the list of members of Congress at the next election will be fully justified. In the interval you may receive other copies of documents similar to that which you have returned, because I can not at present expurgate my mailing list.

Yours, very truly,

EDWARD ATKINSON.

Hon. W. B. SHATTUC, M. C.,
Madisonville, Ohio.

SHATTUC TO ATKINSON.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, August 25, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I have received your letter of the 15th instant, and beg to tell you that I would not, even for the nomination to Congress, support those guilty of criminal aggression against this Government (as you are guilty of). Your intimation that you may be able to have my name taken off the list of the members of the next Congress because I decline to receive your treasonable documents is another evidence of your monumental gall and egotism. You would succeed in your effort about as well as you did in getting your criminal literature in the hands of Aguinaldo and his followers. You know what you were doing when you tried to get this trash in the rebels' hands. Your purpose was to give the rebels encouragement, to embarrass the Government of the United States, and to induce the rebels to hold out until perhaps you could try your luck in having the names of the loyal Congressmen taken off the list at the next election.

Not a precinct in the First Ohio Congressional district would elect you or one of your kind as a delegate to a convention to nominate a director for the county poorhouse. The citizens of this district are loyal, patriotic people, and I am sure that they are not in sympathy with those who are doing all they can to embarrass President McKinley and the Government in the effort to restore order and suppress the rebellion in the Philippine Islands. When that is accomplished, it will be time to determine what form of government shall be established in those islands.

Our people applaud the speech made by our President recently when he said, speaking of our flag: "It is the flag of the free, the hope of the oppressed, and wherever it is assailed, at any sacrifice it will be carried to triumphant peace." That is the kind of talk our people like here.

For fear that you will forget it, let me suggest that you make a memorandum that the nomination for Congress in the First Ohio district will be made about September, 1900. It will be necessary for you, to secure the results you desire, to commence your work a little before that time; the earlier the better, for I am assured that your friend Aguinaldo will cease to exist as a military chieftain long before that date.

Very respectfully,

W. B. SHATTUC, M. C.

EDWARD ATKINSON, Esq., Boston, Mass.

ATKINSON TO SHATTUC.

BOSTON, August 29, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge your letter of August 25. I note with approval that you have published my letter and your reply, which has brought to me many letters of sympathy and approval, with a large demand for the pamphlets, which you do not desire to have sent to you. Perhaps you will also publish this.

Yours, very truly,

EDWARD ATKINSON.

Hon. W. B. SHATTUC, M. C.,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

SHATTUC TO ATKINSON.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, September 2, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 29th ultimo has been received. No doubt you have received many letters of sympathy from your people in this country, and I am confident that your friend and coworker, Aguinaldo, would have written one, thanking you, had not the Government of the United States effectually prevented further communication between you two chieftains. Neither do I doubt in the least that my protest to you (which was published) against your sending your seditious literature to my home had the same effect as a preacher's denunciation of a disreputable theatrical show. You would not have sent your seditious publications to the Philippine Islands unless you had reason to believe that your friend and coworker, Aguinaldo, would be comforted and aided thereby. Webster says that "treason is confined to the actual levying of war against the United States, or adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." Webster was a New England gentleman, too.

During the civil war in this country Lincoln was denounced, Grant was vilified, the Government was assailed, and the war was declared unconstitutional, inhuman, and a failure by some people in Boston as well as by people in other sections of the North, and peace was demanded at any price. The men at the front called the authors of such declarations "copperheads" and "traitors."

In your last letter you do not renew your threat to have my name left off the Congressional list for the Fifty-seventh Congress, but you suggest that I publish the letter. I will do so with pleasure, and I may add that I also have received many letters from Boston and the rest of the United States, but not one of them was a letter of sympathy for me or for Aguinaldo. I am sure that those who wrote me had no sympathy for Aguinaldo, and probably thought I needed none.

Yours, very truly,

W. B. SHATTUC, M. C.

EDWARD ATKINSON, Esq.,
Boston, Mass.

ATKINSON TO SHATTUC.

BOSTON, September 6, 1899.

DEAR SIR: It has given me great satisfaction to receive your letter of September 2, in answer to mine of the 29th.

I beg you to observe that I am still without a reply to my letter of August 31, in which, in reply to your invitation to make the attempt to remove your name from the list of members of Congress, I asked for an outline of the district, stating the principal points, so that I might make a good beginning in the distribution of documents.

As I hardly expected much assistance from you in this matter, I have taken other measures, and have dropped an anchor in the center of your district, from which to carry our anti-imperial chain around and through the whole of it.

A very large edition of No. 5 is called for for general circulation, but it is my intention to print a separate edition of 5,000 copies, more or less, as we may find use for them, for distribution in the First district of Ohio. I find from my correspondence that a large body of your Republican constituents will not join you in denouncing as "traitors," "public enemies," and "seditious persons" men like Senator HOAR, ex-Governor Boutwell, ex-Senator Edmunds, and all the other living men with whom and through whose efforts the Republican party originated. It was my privilege to support them in that undertaking, and for many years in the conduct of the Republican party to which you have proved yourself a recreant by surrendering the principle of liberty at the dictation of the present Administration.

As it is evident to me that you have not had a long experience in what might be called good political society, I therefore venture to suggest to you that in your reply (if you send one) to this letter, which, with your other correspondence, will be published in the special edition for the First Congressional district, you do not use bad language or attempt to apply epithets like that of "copperhead" and "traitor" upon the leading members of the Republican party especially, or upon others of your opponents. It is not good form, and those names are stale. Better invent some good old English terms of a more original character if you desire to indulge in that sort of thing. I would not, if I were in your position. When one engages in sharpshooting with opponents of skill and experience, it is not judicious to use a blunderbuss. These ancient and played-out implements are apt to kick back. I hope it will not hurt you when you get your first fall, and when you come to time again I would advise you not to use a blunderbuss.

My special edition is now in the printer's hands. Several days will elapse before it is ready for the press; therefore there is plenty of time to include your reply to this letter. In the interval the various anchors are being fixed throughout your district and our chains will be riveted ready to pull together on election day.

Yours, very truly,

EDWARD ATKINSON.

Hon. W. B. SHATTUC, Cincinnati, Ohio.

SHATTUC TO ATKINSON.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, September 12, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of September 6. Your pretended desire for information concerning the boundaries of the First Congressional district of Ohio, and your childish insistence upon an answer; your ridiculous and quixotic programme for carrying said district against me, as well as your bald assertion, unsupported by any evidence, that I have surrendered to the dictation of the present Administration, may be dismissed as the vaporings of a distempered imagination. So far as your presence in the First Congressional district of Ohio is concerned, it would have about as much terror to me as the presence of a copperhead with his fangs drawn.

Your reference to my alleged lack of experience in "good political society" is the old, familiar Boston sneer, thinly veiled, at the social standing of anyone not born in the shadow of Bunker Hill Monument or whose ancestors did not come over in the Mayflower.

On the other hand, taking your words literally, if you and your environments fairly represent what you consider good political society, you are entirely correct in assuming that I have had no such experience—nor do I crave any. I would be as much out of place in such society as you would be in loyal, patriotic company. I observe that you wish to suggest to me what you would do if you were in my place. If you were in my place you would not remain there fifty-nine minutes, notwithstanding the anchor you talk so much about as being in the center of my district. You are not of the kind that would be acceptable in this district.

You really grow hysterical over my use of the words "copperhead" and "traitor." You flutter like one who is hit. I have not tried to be original in using them. They have each a well-defined meaning, the precise meaning that I intended to convey. If they are stale, so are "honor" and "loyalty" stale.

Let me suggest that it is not good form for one like you, who has had long experience in "good political society," to deliberately misrepresent, as you do, when you say I have denounced as traitors Senator HOAR, ex-Governor Boutwell, and ex-Senator Edmunds. You will not find the name of one of these men mentioned in my correspondence with you or with anyone else. I did, however, call your attention to Webster's definition of treason, and you are safe to assume that I would classify the whole bunch in accordance with his definition.

I have no doubt that you have letters from alleged Republicans in Ohio who are as sensitive as you are about the reputation of the alleged Republicans in Boston and the New England States and who will render you all the assistance in their power in defaming and vilifying the good name of Ohio's distinguished and patriotic son, President William McKinley.

Notwithstanding the support you have given the Republican party in past years the party still lives. You have now become a reminiscence. You are now telling what you have done in the past, the great men with whom you have been associated, and you crowd in the name of another friend every time you are denounced as you should be. When you first wrote me, you had Senator HOAR. Your letter was answered, and you now parade the names of half a dozen other men whom you allege to be your brother conspirators, and you hide behind the name of some distinguished man like a wanton who pulls down a good name to the level of her own.

Your sharpshooting from the beginning has been from the rear. From 1861 to the present time your skill and experience have never been developed in a place where you were in any danger of getting your hide punctured. You have always kept at a safe distance from the firing line. I assume this is the reason your hide has become so callous and case-hardened, as it were. You chose to join with your brother conspirators in an attack on the conduct of the Government rather than to go to the front, where the sharpshooting is done by the men who carry guns to back up their opinions. You are now playing the same tactics—your friends are on the other side, rebels against this Government, and you keep at a safe distance, as you have always done, from the scene of hostilities. You are not on the "firing line." You would rather print documents and use them in the endless-chain system at 25 cents a copy, the profits to go to Edward Atkinson, and this manner of doing business has been developed by "your skill and experience."

I care nothing about your theories of expansion or nonexpansion, imperialism or anti-imperialism. A man has a right to believe what he pleases. What I do object to and protest against is your seditious literature being sent to my home, because you advocate the discouragement of enlistments in the Army and because you advised citizens to keep recruits from joining the service. You have done as much as in you lies to embarrass the Government, and you have vilified the good name of our President. You have given aid and comfort to those in rebellion against the authority of the United States and have sent your vicious literature to Manila in the hope that it would be circulated among our soldiers, to the end that they might become dissatisfied and mutinous, and also with the hope that it might reach the rebels and encourage them.

This war is the people's war. They inaugurated it, and they will stand by the Administration, which is endeavoring to carry out their will—that the rebellion be suppressed and order restored in the Philippine Islands, without regard to the bullets in front and the snapping of copperheads like you in the rear. Congress, and not the President, will in due time determine what kind of government should be established in the Philippines; but this question will never be definitely settled while our Government is confronted by an armed force.

Very respectfully,

W. B. SHATTUC, M. C.

EDWARD ATKINSON, Esq., Boston, Mass.

ATKINSON TO SHATTUC.

BOSTON, September 14, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Yours of the 12th instant has been received too late to be included in my special edition of No. 5, addressed to the voters of the First Ohio district and others, which will be in circulation next week, having taken your advice in making an early beginning in securing a change in the representation from that district. The document is already going through the press.

Yours, very truly,

EDWARD ATKINSON.

Hon. W. B. SHATTUC, M. C., Cincinnati, Ohio.

SHATTUC TO ATKINSON.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, September 18, 1899.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of the 14th instant, I thought I could start your rebel press in a hurry. I was quite sure you would not want to print a pen picture of yourself, true to life, in one of your own publications.

I observe that you are less frisky, less demonstrative, in your last letter than you were when you commenced this correspondence. I had an idea when you sent your first egotistical, patronizing letter that you might possibly discover your mistake before you got through with the correspondence.

You say in your letter of the 6th instant that I "should not use bad language." My "language" expresses my sentiments. Any "language" that stands for patriotism, love of country, and loyalty to same is "bad language" to you. Any "language" that breathes the spirit of secession, sedition, and treason is approved by you. Now, let me call your attention to the fact that my "language" has not been prohibited by this Government from passing through the mails. Your "language" has been so prohibited. It was prohibited, too, because it was treasonable, seditious, and disloyal.

W. B. SHATTUC, M. C.

EDWARD ATKINSON, Esq.,
President Anti-Imperialist League, Boston, Mass.

ATKINSON TO SHATTUC.

[Special dispatch to the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

BOSTON, September 22, 1899.

Edward Atkinson, one of the vice-presidents of the Anti-Imperialist League, is out with a defi to Congressman WILLIAM B. SHATTUC, of Ohio, who returned one of Atkinson's anti-imperialist circulars with the indorsement, "Take me off your list. I am no traitor to my country." Mr. Atkinson mailed Congressman SHATTUC to-day a copy of his new manifesto. In the latest copy of the Anti-Imperialist Atkinson devotes a whole section for distribution in the First Ohio district, now represented by SHATTUC. A part of the edition is published in the German language, for the benefit of the Congressman's constituents who are of that race.

CHALLENGE ACCEPTED.

Mr. Atkinson said: "It would not be good form for the citizens of another State to attempt to influence the voters of the First Ohio district on the matter of an election of a member of Congress unless he had been invited to address them. Having received such an invitation from WILLIAM B. SHATTUC, I feel warranted in accepting his challenge and in making the effort to expurgate the list of members of the present Congress by representing to the voters of the First district the reason why he ought not to be returned. Mr. SHATTUC can not name a single man of any high public repute of those recently dead—Senator Morrill, of Vermont; John M. Forbes and Henry Lee, of Massachusetts, and others—or of those who are now living, by whom the Republican party was established, who is not now opposed to the policy of the present Administration, or who would to-day support him by their influence or their vote were he a candidate in the district in which the living among them now dwell.

A LITTLE SARCASM.

"I never happened to have met or heard of Mr. W. B. SHATTUC before.

INFERENCE DRAWN.

"I should infer from the tone of his correspondence that he might be one without any personal convictions of his own, but resembling in many ways the able-bodied persons of arms-bearing age who, from the safe security of the pulpit, the public office, or of the staff room of a newspaper, attempt to influence public opinion by using bad language and unseemly epithets in respect to men whose 'shoe latchets they are not worthy to tie.'

"This class of persons is at the same time endeavoring to induce the ignorant and unwary to enlist in the service in the troops destined for the Philippines, in which they would never expose their own health or their own lives.

"Respectfully submitted to the voters of the First Ohio district and others."

SHATTUC TO ATKINSON.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, September 25, 1899.

DEAR SIR: I see that you have again broken loose, through your organ here, in its issue of Saturday, September 23, and that you are to publish a part of your edition in the German language for the benefit of my constituents who are of that nationality. I write you thus hurriedly, suggesting that you add to your tracts (in the German language) the statistics you have published from time to time in favor of restricting and preventing German immigration to this country, and also copies of the puritanical local and State laws you have assisted in passing in restraint of personal liberty far beyond what is consistent with good government.

But, before I forget it, let me say that during this correspondence you have uttered two distinct falsehoods: First, when you say that I have invited you to address the citizens of this Congressional district, and second, when you say that I have called anyone other than yourself a traitor.

It is possible, as you say, that I can not give a single name of those dead or living who were founders of the Republican party who would not approve your conduct. I can, however, give you the names of ninety-nine out of every hundred Republicans, both leaders and laymen, now living, who will say that you are guilty of treason. You have recommended and you are now recommending that our citizens do all they can to stop enlistments for the Army and that Congressmen only be elected who will vote against supplying munitions of war, who will vote against sustaining the Army, and who will do all they can to defeat our armies in the field.

For a man like you, who has always been too cowardly, though "able-bodied and of arms-bearing age," to accept any place of danger in any of our wars, to characterize our patriotic citizens who support the Government and stand by the flag, because they do not themselves enlist in the Army, is another manifestation of your unlimited gall. In the sixties you were, as a statistician, urging the prosecution of the war, encouraging enlistments in the Army, and sanctioning drafts to fill up the depleted ranks. Give me the name of the company and the number of the regiment in which you enlisted at that time. Why do you characterize others for doing just as you have always done?

You are slandering and vilifying the President and the members of his Cabinet. You are doing all you can to embarrass the Government in the prosecution of this war in every conceivable way. Your literature has been barred from the United States mail because it was seditious. The Government itself has declared you, not in so many words, but in reality, a traitor. I do not understand that the authorities have criticised your grammar, or charged you with using "bad language" in a grammatical sense. One can be a traitor and still use good language. A man may be a patriot and not speak French.

I notice you say you "never have happened to have met or heard of W. B. SHATTUC before." There are at least 44,000 patriotic gentlemen residing in the First Congressional district of Ohio who have been as fortunate in this respect as I have been, and very many thousands of the residents of this district will accept your statement as to your having not heard of me before as being literally true. Your grandiloquent, egotistical, and patronizing (first) letter to me proves conclusively that you were serious when you made that statement.

I have heard of you nearly all my life. While a boy in the Union Army, on the firing line, shooting as I talked, against secession, I heard of you. You were at home in your luxurious, velvet-carpeted, mahogany-finished, steam-heated office in Boston making statistics at so much a page (for the benefit of Edward Atkinson), showing the resources of the North and the South, and presenting all the arguments that could be presented to encourage patriotic people to support the Administration in its efforts to put down the rebellion and restore order. You claimed that the Southern people (as brave a people as the world ever saw) should be subdued and governed without their consent.

Now, you are the chief rebel of this country. You have done everything in your power to prevent our army being successful in the island of Luzon, in order that rebellion might succeed there, on the plea that we have no right to govern except with the consent of the governed. You are deceiving yourself very much when you imagine that your efforts will have any appreciable effect in Ohio. Our people, as a rule, hold you in utter contempt. The President, a citizen of Ohio, is carrying out the express wishes not only of the people of Ohio but of all the patriotic citizens of the United States. He did not commence this war. It was the people's war. They inaugurated it and demanded action, and it was a long time before the Chief Executive yielded to the public demand.

The patriotic people of this country will stand by the President in his effort to carry out their wishes in suppressing the rebellion and restoring order in the Philippine Islands. Every American citizen has a right to entertain and express his opinions as to the future of the Philippine Islands, but it is another thing when anyone endeavors, as you have done, to obstruct and embarrass our Government in the maintenance of our Army and the conduct of a campaign already in operation under the direction of the Government.

Judging from your correspondence, you no doubt group the population of the United States in three classes:

First. Edward Atkinson.

Second. Ex-Governor Boutwell, Senator HOAR, ex-Senator Edmunds.

Third. The rest of the United States.

In every letter you write you name these three gentlemen as your supporters, and assume that they possess all the brains and patriotism of the country. I have no doubt that it was one of your own ancestors who stated in a public address in Boston over a hundred years ago that civilization might extend as far west as Buffalo, N. Y., but not beyond that point, and the man who made that statement had about as much knowledge of the West as you seem to have of the First Congressional district of Ohio. Your relations with the great men of this country and your connection with the public affairs in the past thirty-six years have been just about as potential in influencing and determining results as the scorer in a base ball game has in determining the result of the contest. Because you have "kept tab" on events as they occurred, you imagine you have been a potent factor in shaping them.

Yours, etc.,

W. B. SHATTUC, M. C.

EDWARD ATKINSON, Esq., Boston, Mass.

Now, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Atkinson has said (and I quote from his Science of Nutrition): "I suppose everyone has a mission. My own mission appears to be to overcome the inertia of woman," and that being so, I suggest that he had better in future apply himself to his mission.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ALLEN of Maine having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 2924. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado;

S. 2493. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for land in certain cases;

S. 3616. An act to authorize the payment of traveling allowances to enlisted men of the regular and volunteer forces when discharged by order of the Secretary of War and stated by him as entitled to travel pay;

S. 3430. An act to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the United States Army;

S. 3075. An act granting an increase of pension to Marie J. Blaisdell;

S. 2883. An act to change the characteristic of Cape Cod light, Massachusetts; and

S. 2581. An act to incorporate the National White Cross of America, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8063. An act to legalize and maintain the iron bridge across Pearl River at Rockport, Miss.;

H. R. 10311. An act to authorize the Shreveport and Red River Valley Railway Company to build and maintain a railway bridge across Red River at or near the town of Alexandria, in the parish of Rapides, State of Louisiana;

H. R. 60. An act to create the northwestern division of the northern district of Georgia for judicial purposes and to fix the time and place for holding court therein;

H. R. 9284. An act to attach the county of Foard, in the State of Texas, to the Fort Worth division of the northern district of Texas, and providing that all process issued against defendants residing in said county shall be returned to Fort Worth; and

H. R. 9713. An act permitting the building of a dam between Coon Rapids and the north limits of the city of Minneapolis, Minn., across the Mississippi River.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] who controls the time on the other side will now say to whom he yields.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, there are several gentlemen on this side to whom I promised to yield, but as I do not see any of them upon the floor just now, I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], if he can possibly do so, to yield time now to some one on his side.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentleman from New York for the courtesy he has extended me in granting me a few minutes of the time devoted to general debate. I assure the committee that I will not impose upon their patience or their time by attempting a logical discussion of the merits of the great questions that are now before Congress, but rather will give some impressions that have come to me as a new member, as I have been sitting here for four months a silent listener to those who, by their experience and their ability, have demonstrated their fitness to discuss the issues that are to become the policies of the two great parties in the contest upon which we are about to enter for the purpose of controlling the affairs of our common country for the four years that are to follow.

This debate has been as general as the geographical, commercial, and political interests of the country are diversified. During the early days of the session, when the financial bill was under discussion—that great measure by the enactment of which the Republican party kept its plighted faith to the country and to the world—I felt like congratulating my colleague from Kansas, Mr. RIDGELY, who is all that is left of the Populist party in our State, upon what must have been a very pleasant experience to him—that of seeing the great Democratic party of this country espousing with such vehemence the doctrines which have been the cardinal principles of Populism in Kansas for more than a decade. Out in Kansas every voter is a post graduate in financial discussion.

We have been the storm center of Populism. It was in Kansas that Jerry Simpson made his barefoot race for Congress upon the financial question. It was in Kansas that the wind blew through Peffer's whiskers and landed him in the United States Senate upon the money question. It was in Kansas that the distinguished gentleman, Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Georgia, who now occupies a seat in this House, came to organize the Farmers' Alliance, which gave birth to Populism, and which was run upon the money question and has become such a powerful adjunct of Democracy in the West.

As I listened in the early part of this session to the discussions of the financial question, the expressions used, especially by the gentleman from Colorado and the gentleman from Texas, were wonderfully familiar to us as they talked about basic money, the money of final redemption, and the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. And as they made their drastic prophecies of misfortune and calamity that would come to us as a people if the gold standard were adopted, I thought to myself history is again repeating itself, for I remember four years ago that the same prophecies were made with a great deal more unanimity upon the other side of the Chamber than at present of the terrible results that would befall us as a people if the Republican party were put into power pledged to such legislation as we were about to enact. Four years ago the discussion started here and was taken up by the great majority of the Democratic press, and he who is the incarnation of Popocracy—and let me define what Popocracy is; it is a cross between Democracy and Populism, with Populism as the mother, and the maternal side has had the best of it in the results. I repeat: He who is the incarnation of Popocracy traveled from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, declaring that the commercial depression that was then upon the people and the country could never be relieved until the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was enacted into law, and that without the aid or consent of any other nation.

I remember very distinctly in the campaign of 1896 that the Demo-Pops of Kansas carried in their torchlight processions transparencies that read: "Vote for Bryan and dollar wheat!" "Vote for McKinley and 25-cent wheat!" And the honest farmer, who was then suffering under the hard times and business depression, incident to a Democratic Administration that was then upon us, and was selling his wheat at 35 cents and his corn from 12 to 16 cents, said, "Things can not be any worse than they are now, and we will take a dose of this new political nostrum and try it once anyway." But Mr. McKinley was elected President. The gold standard is enacted into law, and to-day the farmers of the great Middle West are getting 60 cents for their wheat, 30 cents for their corn; hogs, cattle, and horses are selling for from 50 to 100 per cent more than they did in 1896, and then you prophets of evil have the audacity to stand up in the American Congress and again make your prophecies of misfortune that will come to the American people if the party is retained in power under whose Administration prosperity has come in spite of your predilections.

"Oh, but," say our Democratic friends, "you Republicans are trying to give McKinley's Administration credit for the famine in India, failure of crops in other countries, and other misfortunes that have befallen the human race during the past three years that are largely responsible for better prices that now exist, and it is simply good luck rather than good management upon your part." My answer is as logical as your premises. For you may call it luck if you choose, but I would rather belong to a party that always has luck follow its administration of the affairs of this country than to belong to a party that never has any luck and only thrives on calamity and despair. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Chairman, the great cause of the prosperity that has come to us is the fulfillment of the pledges made by the Republican party in 1896.

We have placed upon the statutes the Dingley bill. We opened the factories rather than the mints, and have given employment to labor everywhere, and we have placed the credit of the country upon a sound financial basis, that has restored confidence and sent a thrill of life through the great commercial heart of our nation that has brought prosperity to us all.

Be not deceived, my Democratic friends, in cherishing the belief that you can any more easily deceive the people in 1900 than you did in 1896. The laboring man who everywhere is receiving better wages with permanent employment, the farmers both North and South, East and West, with the great object lesson of the past four years before them, the burden bearers and the breadwinners everywhere in this great country of ours, will be slow to accept as true any prophecies you may make regarding the future, remembering, as they must, what a colossal failure the Democratic party made in the prophesying business in 1896. And indeed, as I look back half a century, I discover that the Democratic party of to-day is occupying the same position in regard to all the great questions that mark national progress and national development that she has occupied in the past. Simply the party of negation, and is usually a decade behind the times, only acknowledging that as a nation we are making progress when the stern logic of events forces such confession.

I remember that in the latter part of the eighties there appeared in Kansas a little book entitled "The Seven Financial Conspiracies." It was adopted as the text-book of the Populist and Democratic parties in the West. They commenced with the financial history of our country at the time the Republican party came into power and branded each one of the great laws that have been placed upon our statute books by the Republican party. These great laws that mark the milestones of our national growth and progress were characterized as conspiracies against the public welfare, and this sentiment was taken up by the allied forces of Democracy and Populism in 1896, and the crime of 1873 was made their battle cry in that memorable contest. My Democratic friends, did you ever stop to think that when you have a conspiracy you must have a conspirator? The so-called conspiracies, the exemption clause upon the greenbacks, the national banking act, the credit-strengthening act, each one of these great measures that became laws from 1861 to 1865, whose signature, I ask, was necessary to complete these great acts into law and thereby became a part of the conspiracy and one of the conspirators?

I pause with reverence as I take the name of Abraham Lincoln upon my lips and leave it to the great jury of humanity whether he was a conspirator against his country's welfare and his country's honor. And thus they followed along each one of these great provisions until they reached the culmination of all the conspiracies in the so-called crime of 1873. Again I ask you whose signature made that enactment of Congress a law? It was the silent man of destiny who received the sword of General Lee beneath the knotted boughs of the apple tree at Appomattox. I leave history and future generations to render the verdict whether U. S. Grant was a conspirator against the country for which he had done so much and he loved so well; and to say that such a law was passed without knowing its purport is an insult not only to the intelligence of President Grant, but to the American Congress as well.

No bitter denunciations, no glittering generalities, can detract from the splendid history of the Republican party in the past or can swerve it from accepting the responsibilities of the present.

No, my Democratic friends, you may take the most eloquent words that ever fell from the lips of William Jennings Bryan and write them in letters of light across the arch of heaven, with one base of that arch, if you please, resting upon his crown of thorns and the other upon his cross of gold, and just beneath I will write one word in letters plain that will live in the hearts of grateful humanity after Bryan and Populism are forgotten, and that word is Appomattox.

Appomattox, with all the meaning that it conveys; for at that place and that hour the approval of the people of this country was placed upon national sovereignty and national unity, and this approval was sealed by the blood of the manhood of the North and chivalry of the South.

And now the Democratic party, as they are making up the issues for another national campaign, find themselves in this position: They are afraid to make the slogan of 1896 the main issue in 1900, and they can not abandon free coinage of silver at 16 to 1, for that would mean the passing of Mr. Bryan, who, if he is not discreet, is at least consistent, for having once said the horse is 16 feet high, adheres to it with a tenacity of purpose worthy of a better cause. So they are compelled to make an issue by tendering sympathy and hope to those who are in open rebellion with the armies of the United States.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I ask the attention of the committee for a few minutes, as I shall give the impressions that have come to me as I have listened to the debates upon the new issues that are forced upon us as a result of the war with Spain.

I have listened to this great debate, not as a lawyer, but as a layman, one whose busy life has been spent in the mart rather than the forum, in the producing and in the buying and selling the articles that enter into the commerce of our great country, rather than in the theoretical jugglery with financial theories as expounded by unpronounceable French authors or by men who have no practical knowledge of affairs. And while, upon many of the questions that Congress is called upon to consider, a technical knowledge of the law is of great benefit, and while I have the highest regard for the legal profession, yet, like my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] I am consoled in the thought that my mind is not legal to that extreme degree that constitutional rabies or hydrophobia may take possession of me and lead me to do strange things and follow after strange gods.

I believe the Constitution of the United States is admissible of an interpretation broad enough and generous enough to meet every condition that shall come into our national life that bears upon its face merit and is found to stand for the nation's honor and welfare, for the nation's growth, and the advancement of human progress and Christian civilization.

Then, Mr. Chairman, let us consider briefly the facts as they exist to-day with reference to the relations of our Government to our insular possessions, which have come to us primarily as the fortunes of war, but have brought new and great responsibilities which we must either accept or deny. I believe that from the very hour that Admiral Dewey sunk the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila, the duty and the responsibility has been resting upon our Government to establish law and order, and to guarantee life and liberty and the pursuit of happiness to the people of those unfortunate islands.

The Administration, realizing this great duty, accepted the responsibility. And I most sincerely believe, had it not been for the sympathy and encouragement extended by some of our own people to the insurgents who were opposing, in the Philippines, what seems to me to be the manifest duty of our Government—I believe that order and good government would have been restored there long since, and hundreds of lives of our brave boys would have been saved, and millions of treasure as well.

Mr. Chairman, what would have been the result to the people of the Philippines had the Administration ordered our fleet to sail away after the destruction of the Spanish fleet on that memorable 1st of May? Had this been done there would have been precipitated an internal strife and chaos that would have jeopardized the lives and property of citizens of every country that might have been represented there, and would have been the excuse for some of the other nations of the world to have taken possession and done what was our manifest duty to do.

Had the American fleet sailed away and left that hapless island to its own internal strife and dissension or to be subdued by some of the other nations, the Administration would have justly deserved not only the execration of our own people, but of the civilized world as well.

And I believe I assert the truth when I say that immediate independence for the Filipinos has never for one moment been a possibility since Dewey's guns were booming at Manila Bay. And were it not for the mean political advantage which is hoped to be gained, and I assure you it is only a hope, every honest man who has studied the history and character of these people would agree with me.

And the men who to-day are expending sympathy upon the liberty-loving Filipinos, and are talking loudly of the desecration of the Declaration of Independence, I want to ask them if they know of any flag that stands for a better or greater liberty than does ours? And what country is better equipped to instruct these people in the science of self-government? Oh, but says our Democratic friends, we are drifting toward imperialism, and this is but the beginning of the ending of popular government. Imperialism in its better sense has no terrors to me and need have to no loyal American citizen. If by imperialism you mean our right to govern and control our new possessions until such a time as they have demonstrated their ability for self-government, then I am in favor of imperialism.

But if by it you mean that we are to hold these people, as the Democratic party apparently want the world to think we will, in bondage and slavery, denying to them the blessings of our civilization, imposing upon them unjust taxes for our own benefit, and making no effort to improve their condition, then I am, and all loyal men will be, opposed to imperialism.

But shame, thrice shame, upon the American citizen and a greater shame still upon a great political party that promulgates the theory that a Congress which is to be the guardians of our new possessions will ever be elected by the people of the United States that will not deal fairly and honorably by the people of these dependencies.

I am willing to stake the future not only of our country, but our dependencies as well, upon the common sense, the business judgment, the humanity and patriotism of the people of the United States. And a Congress that shall dare to do other than what is best for the welfare of the people of our new possessions will be deposed by an indignant and outraged people.

The hue and cry that has been raised by the Democrats, assisted by a few misguided Republicans, over the Puerto Rican tariff is a tempest in a teapot, and time will justify the position the Republican party has taken upon this matter, as it has justified the positions she has taken upon all the great questions for nearly half a century. Men who are the unfortunate victims of the constitutional mania, I presume, see in our present position a future freighted with great peril. But to me, as a layman, after listening to the exhaustive debates upon the constitutional phase of this question from both sides, I am thoroughly convinced that there is plenty of law and Constitution for us to take either course we may choose in this matter.

Then, this being the case, let us take a plain, businesslike view of the situation, and adopt that course that can cause us the least embarrassment in the future and at the same time permit us to fulfill the great obligation we are under to the people of these new possessions and to civilization.

And that course will be to hold these new possessions under such government and laws as Congress shall provide until such a time as we can demonstrate to them, or they can demonstrate to us, their fitness for self-government.

When that time shall arrive we can trust the Congress of the United States to mete out to them full and impartial justness.

To admit these people, at this time, to the free rights of American citizens under the Constitution would be both unwise and impolitic.

But in the course of time, if they take kindly to the principles of self-government and liberty, then the question of extending the Constitution to these islands can be discussed with open justice to all. But the great question that confronts us now is to give our new possessions such a form of government that will better their condition morally and commercially, and will develop in them that self-reliance and independence, that love of liberty—not liberty without license, but liberty under law—that is the foundation and the very genius of our Government. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. BAILEY of Kansas] seems to be very much worried about the Populist party and the Democratic party. He seems to think we have gone into "the sere and yellow leaf." I want to say to the gentleman that the Populist party has never abandoned an issue by working with other parties or sacrificed a principle. The Populist party contended, in common with the great mass of the Democratic party, the Silver Republican party, and, really, with the rank and file of the Republican party, that a sufficiency of money is as necessary to prosperity as is a sufficiency of blood to the health of the human body.

The Populist party has always contended that the quantitive theory of money and not the material from which it is made is the gist of the controversy, so the material is good. We have always insisted that neither gold nor silver is in itself sacred, but the object to be reached is to have the amount of good money commensurate with the business to be transacted, and issued and controlled by the Government, and that when such a condition is reached we will have prosperity. That contention has been proven beyond any question, and the Republican party is now on the back track toward this theory; it is now flooding the entire country with its literature, and especially with a speech delivered here a few weeks ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY], elected as a Democrat, but who is now seeking to get the Republican nomination of his district in the State of Pennsylvania, if he has not already gotten it.

That speech which they are now circulating states our position pretty clearly. It argues from our original principles that the quantitive theory of money is the thing that has been dividing parties for many years, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania gives as his excuse for abandoning his former position that the production of gold has become so enormous that it is now furnishing us abundantly, and more currency than both gold and silver did in the past, and he comes forward now as a Republican, taken into the fold of the party, and is now attempting to be elected by the Republican party on its platform, and he says accordingly that the abundance of money furnished through the increased production of gold and the money furnished by the bank circulation have been so great that it has greatly contributed to the prosperity that is now supposed to exist and dispenses with the necessity for silver, and says that the increase of gold has proven our contention and his former contention.

But I want to say to my friend Mr. BAILEY of Kansas that the Populist party, the Bryan Democratic party, and the Silver Republican party are made of the rank and file of the American people. They represent the manhood of the American people; they represent the individual in our body politic; while the Republican organization is now known all over the country to represent essentially and only accumulated wealth and the classes as against the masses.

Now, sir, we might analyze for a moment how it is that the present Administration is in power.

I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that if the voter in the last election had been untrammelled; if that vote had been the honest expression of the individual voter, without extraneous influences, Mr. McKinley never could have occupied the White House of this nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republican party, bear in mind, did not get the vote of the laborer on the farm; it did not get the majority out of the white English speaking people of the United States; it did not get the support of the masses without the use of the enormous corruption fund; but it did get the election and how did it secure it? I want to remind our friends on the other side, that the nomination of Mr. McKinley was not spontaneous, I want to remind them of conditions that prevailed then, and let them analyze for a moment how it came about that he did get the nomination. Go to your own leaders, and what do you find?

There appeared in the public press before his nomination, under the signature of a Republican Senator from New Hampshire [Senator CHANDLER of New Hampshire], an article stating that a campaign fund had been contributed by the manufacturing interests and the corporations of the country amounting to about a quarter of a million of dollars. Not that this sum was to be used against the Democratic party in that campaign, but he complained that $250,000 had been raised for the purpose of securing the nomination of the present incumbent as against any other Republican in his party. And, Mr. Chairman, he not only put that over his own signature in the public press, but he reannounced it on the floor of the Senate of the United States, and gave warning then, before this Administration came into power, that if the moneyed interests raised a quarter of a million of dollars for a favorite son and expended that money on him, the same interests would demand its return when he entered into the duties of the Executive office.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like for our friends on the other side to examine this question and see who have occupied and who now occupy the offices under him in pursuance of that election. I would like them to examine and see where the farmer, where the agriculturist, where the laborer, where the teacher, where the intelligent ordinary citizen of the country has been recognized in the Cabinet of the present Administration and in the control of the Government of this country. I would like them to say whether the manhood, whether the intelligence, of the country has been amply and fully recognized, or whether the mere representatives of wealth are not found as turning the scales in the makeup of the governing forces of the nation.

Now, let us look for a moment at what is going on in governmental circles. But before proceeding with that branch of the subject, I wish to pursue the question of the electors, and of this election in particular, a little further. I wish to ask where and how the electors were obtained. If you take the colored man out of the voting machinery of the United States, the present occupant of the White House never could have succeeded in securing the place which he now holds. That position for him would have been an utter impossibility without the vote of the colored man, as he is numerous enough to make a balance of power.

But, Mr. Chairman, ever since the days when Abraham Lincoln set the pace that gave deserved freedom to every black man in the United States, most every colored man who was the beneficiary of that act has given a Republican vote, as a rule, not from conviction, not from love for living Republican principles, but as an act of gratitude for what the Republican party did for him back in the days of the sixties. But now march these voters to one side; deprive the colored men of their rights as voters, and those who hold office now in the Republican party would certainly be defeated.

But take another view of the case. Leave him and go and take the foreign population of the country—that part of the population who can not speak the English tongue; take that part of the population who have just reached our shores and know nothing of our Government, and who care nothing about the votes they cast; who vote year in and year out at the behest of the great manufacturers and combinations who work them; put them aside, and the Republican party could never occupy power in this country. Pass them over and take from them the unlimited campaign fund that is used in every portion of the country to buy newspapers, to put in office men who control great bodies of men, and the corrupt disposition of patronage, and you never could occupy positions of trust in this country which are determined by the popular voice.

If there is one thing, Mr. Chairman, that I am proud of, it is that I belong to a party that is in the interest of the men who vote from principle, in the interest of the men who toil, in the interest of the great masses of the people, rather than in the interest of the accumulated wealth and especially favored classes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, sir, I have no objection to the Democratic party, to the Silver Republican party, to the Populist party, to the Prohibition or any other parties that believe in the same doctrines, as I believe in uniting their good efforts. I shall be glad to have them come forward and join hands and say, "We are working for the great principle, and not for any partisan or spoils purpose."

Now, what is the Republican party that the gentleman talks so much about in this Hall doing now? What is it doing at the present time? It is dodging and endeavoring to run the gantlet of an outraged constituency. I noticed in the Denver Evening Post of April 1 a cartoon very significantly delineating its attitude on the Puerto Rican bill. That cartoon shows a box like a ticket office of a theater. Uncle Sam is standing in the box with a bunch of pamphlets containing the Constitution in his left hand and a line of Puerto Ricans walking up to the box office. Uncle Sam says, "Come up, Puerto Ricans, and get your copy of the Constitution." The first one steps up and holds out his hand to take the Constitution of the United States and Uncle Sam hits him in the nose and he drops backward, while Uncle Sam throws up his hands and says, "April fool." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, sir, this morning I picked up the North American, of Philadelphia, a Republican paper, which congratulates the Republican party that it is going to bring General Otis away from the Philippines. It says that the mistake has been going on long enough and that the managers of the Republican party in Washington are to be congratulated that they are going to allow the Republicans of the country to have at least a fighting show for the fall campaign.

Mr. GAINES. Will my friend from Colorado yield?

Mr. BELL. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. The reason why they are bringing him home is probably that they want to stop the war over there.

Mr. BELL. Yes; the war stops every morning.

We find that last night a gentleman who had occupied a high office under this Government, Hon. Webster Davis, made a speech to an enormous audience in this city in favor of the Boers in South Africa. That gentleman has had to lay down his commission within the last few days in order to raise his voice for liberty and humanity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The teachings of liberty and humanity are inconsistent with the action of the Republican party as it is now operated. The rank and file of all parties love liberty and fair play.

Now, sir, let us go on a little further. When President McKinley was running for office we found that the railroads were pressed into service all over the country. He remained in Canton, Ohio, and men were marched to him by the great employers of labor all over this land, and he sung those beautiful platitudes to them in most dulcet, cadent strains day in and day out, while the Republican press held up Mr. Bryan as subject to the severest criticism for swinging around the circle and talking to the people at their own homes and in their own halls. But I want to suggest to our friends that from the day this Administration came into office, Cabinet officers and other officers of the Administration have been used right along as campaign speakers, and they are trekking over this country; employees often for thirty days at a time off duty, while under the pay of the Government of the United States, speaking for the Republican party.

I know of men who are drawing big salaries who have stayed away from their official places for thirty or forty days to take the platform for the Republican party while under the pay of the people of the United States.

Now, let us see why the bank trusts, sugar trusts, oil trusts, railroads, and all other combines are aligning themselves with the Republican party. One of the best tests for the voter is to find out where the enemies of good government think they are most secure; then the friends of the Government can safely take the other side.

Soon after the last Presidential election the Republican clubs had a meeting in Baltimore, and Senator THURSTON, the chairman of the last Republican convention, addressed those clubs and told them in plain language that all the combinations of capital in the Democratic party, all of the trusts and many of the combines in that party, had been scared out of it by William J. Bryan with his advocacy of 16 to 1, and he said they all came in and voted for William McKinley in the last campaign. Should he not be loved also for the dangerous elements he deters?

Not only that, but soon after that campaign, the Republican governor of Michigan, before an audience in that State, warned his people of the same thing. He said, "My fellow-citizens, every great combination of capital in the State of Michigan last year moved into the Republican party, and I want to say to you that these are birds of ill omen. I want to say to you that if they keep flocking to the Republican party, they will certainly oust and remove from that party the representatives of the Republicans of Lincoln and Grant. I want you to understand that; and while I believe you are all right, and while I believe the rank and file of all parties are honest, it is the leadership that is wrong." He says: "You may talk about leadership; you may put a man like Lincoln at the head of the Republican party or any other party and you will have a government by the people and for the people."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes additional to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELL. "But," he says, "you may put some other persons at the head of the Republican party or any other party, and I want to warn you that you will have a government only for syndicates and combines."

That was very significant. Any man can trace the reference; and I want to say, with all due respect to the present Administration, that there never has been before a line of officials in those high places or a party that has come so near wrecking the American government as has the present Administration.

Property interests have run riot. They have had the whole thing. Human beings have not been considered. There has been a combination of capital that has run every department, and it is impossible for this House to attract attention to abuses of that line of persons. I have called attention to the fact before that in your mail contracts and every other contract with this Government the railroads may charge three or four prices for services rendered the Government, and you can not make an official of this Administration cast his eyes in that direction; but you let some poor, unfortunate, weak-dispositioned individual steal $25 out of the post-office, and they will throw the entire weight of the American Government after him and pursue him until they lodge him in the penitentiary. The same un-American policy runs all along the line.

Now, sir, going further, the Bryan Democrats, Populists, and Silver Republicans are advocating the same doctrines that Jefferson advocated, that Lincoln advocated, that every lover of liberty and good government in this nation and all other nations have advocated, so far as we understand it—that is, a government for and by the people. We have a party of the people; we have a party that is impoverished, that can not raise a campaign fund, and the other side can raise more campaign funds than they can possibly use. Why? Because it is wealth, aggregated greed, it is special privileges, that now have possession of the Government. They put up the expenses, and therefore claim the right to operate it for capital. Men are forgotten. I have become very tired of listening to this harping about patriotism and this harping about patriotic duties by those who ever put capital above men, and what this man and that man is doing for humanity.

Now, our friends talk so much about patriotism for the Cubans and patriotism for the Puerto Ricans and patriotism in connection with the Philippine Islands, when every man in this House knows that the object of the moving powers is not the good of these individuals, but the chief aim is to obtain a control of what they have. That is the ultimate object. It is not to give to the individual freedom or liberty, to benefit him, but to benefit certain investors of this country. Now, nobody can be fooled about this here with what we have seen and heard.

Take it on Puerto Rico alone; one of the Puerto Rican officers, whom I heard in a public meeting here, said there were 93 per cent of the great dailies of the United States that insisted upon free trade being given to Puerto Rico, and all the Puerto Ricans demanded it. Yet we find men stand right up here and say they are doing this for the benefit of the Puerto Ricans; that the Puerto Ricans do not know what they want. Now, everybody knows that what has been done is at the dictation of the sugar men, and especially at the dictation of the tobacco men; yet Representatives are asserting here and they are asserting it to the American people that it is for the benefit of Puerto Ricans. I do not believe they can fool the American people much longer.

If you wipe out coercion among the American voters, they will wipe you out. If you do not use money in elections, you know and I know that this Administration never could succeed itself, and without these depraved methods this Administration never could have gotten its first hold on the American people. Twenty-five or thirty million dollars expended, with its great coercive powers, in the last campaign did the work. I saw it. You go to the coal miners. There you will find they coerced many of the employees; men who can not speak the English language were voted by you. They secured a change in the precincts so that they might not be mixed with the town people, so if men tried to conceal their votes their employers could detect it if they had voted against them, and if the vote does not go to the Republican party they go out of employment. That is done all over the United States.

I was in Chicago during the last campaign, I was in Nebraska during the last campaign, and I know how they marched them there; I know numerous men who lost their places for even wearing a Bryan button concealed, and yet they call this a free government! These men who benefited through these methods stand up here and prate about freedom, and liberty, and human rights, and freedom of the ballot. Why, I want to say to our friends the abuse of the ballot in the South is not an atom compared with the abuse of the ballot in the great States of the East. Philadelphia, Delaware, New Jersey are hotbeds of political corruption. It is not a drop in the bucket compared with the coercion and force used on the labor vote in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. BELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say further that with all this pretense about government for and by the people, you have not got it, neither are you trying to get it. You can not have a free government purchased, and you can not have a free government coerced; you can not have a free government where every man does not go forth and cast his ballot untrammeled. The powers that control the laborer and the means by which he lives can in many cases coerce his vote against his better judgment.

Now, our friends talk a great deal about the small chances of success of William Jennings Bryan. Why, if they had a man like William Jennings Bryan on their ticket and they had used the same coercion and the same moneyed influence for him that Mr. McKinley had in the last campaign, he would have carried almost every State in the Union. All the success Mr. Bryan has secured is by force of principles for which he contends. His party is without means and has no disposition to use a large fund or to coerce votes. The Republicans have every dollar that they can possibly use.

I saw men in the last campaign, men that had been leaders in our party, claiming to go off and buy sheep and cattle in distant countries, and they turned up in distant States with their pockets full of railroad passes; they turned up in those places working for the Republican party. We had supported them here, this little coterie of Populists in this House, had relied on them, and when the time came they were influenced.

I can pick you out among the appointees of the present Administration lifelong Democrats that are now drawing large salaries, and before election spending thirty and forty days for the Republican party in the campaign, at the expense of the people of the United States. Not only that, but you will bear in mind that when a certain Senator was to be elected in Ohio, the Republican papers all over this country stated that all of the appointees from the State of Ohio had been ordered home; and they were kept there, at the expense of the American people, until a certain man succeeded. And yet these gentlemen talk about free government; they talk about economical government; and they talk about the right to vote and the privileges of American citizenship.

Then they talk about prosperity. There is no extraordinary prosperity where so many men are working for a dollar and a dollar and a quarter a day, when the necessaries of life are elevated as they have been since these wars began.

Now let us see about this prosperity. I say there is not a general prosperity. There is this: We have been going on a war footing for over two-thirds of this Administration, and but for the war picking a hundred thousand men out of the labor ranks, putting them in the Army, and starting up all these factories and foundries, and consuming and wasting innumerable tons of material, including breadstuffs, meat, and everything else, there would not have been anything in your supposed prosperity of to-day except such as the increased gold output made.

The increase in money has raised general prices, but that is not great; the cause of the great rise in prices is the trusts, and nothing else. In reference to this great rise in prices you may take up fence wire, and it is doubled to your farmer, while he gets 10 or 15 cents extra for his wheat. Take up nails, and the price has doubled; iron piping doubled; take up the broom you sweep your floor with, and it has almost doubled; take up your oil, and it has greatly enhanced in price. I do not believe to-day that the laboring man of the United States, in purchasing power of his wages, has benefited much except in increased employment.

This prosperity never was made by the Republican party. This same supposed prosperity is in Germany; it is in Europe; it has invaded even China as a result of the enlarged money supply. The world is getting now the benefit of the great inventions that have been maturing so long. Things are tending higher, men are using more, but the proportion between the men who are running the mill and the men who are working in the mill—the proportion of increase is more than 100 per cent in favor of the men who own the machinery.

The farmer is not getting rich; he never can get rich in a government that gets its wealth by taxing him continually for every other purpose except the one in which he is engaged. The farmer exports a good deal more than one-half of the material that makes up the great balance of trade to Europe. Yet when you talk about the exports you infer that these new islands are the cause. The fact is that you export but a little more than you did formerly to them, if even as much. The statistics show no influence of territorial expansion accounting for our increased trade. No policy of any political party affects it. It is the development of our resources and the great demands of Great Britain, Russia, Japan, and other foreign countries that made these changes.

There is no comparison between the exports to Puerto Rico now and when Spain was in charge. They have grown less. You never did do any business with the Philippines of any consequence outside of our war business over there; you never will do a great deal, because they use but few of our products.

Now, I want to say, in conclusion, that our friend [Mr. BAILEY of Kansas] makes the criticism just indulged in for the purpose of trying to prevent a combine of the Populists, the Bryan Democrats, and the Silver Republicans, but he and his party will make a dismal failure. We do not care whether you say that we have quit the Populist party, or have quit the Democratic party, or that we quit the Silver Republican party, or whatever else you say about us. We intend to work and to vote, as long as we keep our senses, for the human being, for human rights, and human liberty as against corporate greed and the imposition of a heartless power, that is now controlling this and all civilized nations on the face of the globe—the greatest curse with which civilization is now threatened. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

[Mr. SMALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], and after that to yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STOKES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] kindly agreed to give me a few minutes of his time, and, although I have no prepared speech, I feel that there are certain matters which should be brought clearly before Congress and the people of this country on the so-called "plain duty" policy of the President. The President of the United States in his annual message, December last, stated that it was our "plain duty" to give to the people of Puerto Rico "free access to our markets."

I shall undertake, and shall prove, I think, conclusively, that the President has abandoned his plain-duty policy, and that, too, without giving Congress the benefit of his reasons, if he has any, for so doing. He said: "Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariff between the United States and Puerto Rico and give her products free access to our markets." Where, I ask, does the President stand to-day on this question?

Let us investigate for a few moments. This question was asked no longer than three days ago in the Senate by a distinguished Republican Senator, and the American people are asking the same thing to-day. The people, Mr. Chairman, have the right to know, and certainly Congress, the lawmaking power, is entitled to know, since this question involves particularly the welfare of our country and involves the integrity of our Government.

It has been stated by Republican members of this body outside of this House with particularity, and, sir, in a general way in the House, that the President has reversed himself upon this plain-duty proposition which was involved in the infamous measure swept through this body by a bridled Republican majority, although it undertook to and will yet strip the people of Puerto Rico of their inalienable rights and those guarded and granted by our Constitution, which I contend is the law of that island, as much so as of New Mexico and Arizona.

The President to-day stands in a doubtful position before Congress and the public, but shall not longer if my voice, feeble as it may be, can be raised to state and prove that he has completely reversed himself in the "plain duty" path so clearly marked out for us and himself. I shall lay before the "plain" people of this country the "plain" facts, and I challenge here and now a successful refutation of the plain facts which I shall now state.

I read, first, the conversation had at the Republican caucus on the Puerto Rican bill between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], wherein the former asked the latter the question as to how the President stood on the 15 per cent tariff bill then pending before the caucus. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] said:

I saw the President this afternoon, and he told me that he had no doubt of the constitutionality of the bill. He told me also that if the bill is passed by Congress he will sign it.

This statement has never been disputed, though published the next morning after the caucus in the Washington Post, an Administration paper. But I have other proofs than this. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who supported this 15 per cent bill, in replying to the protest against his vote made by his constituents, used this language, still undisputed, which was published in the Indianapolis Journal, the leading Republican paper, of March 6:

I voted for the bill at the earnest solicitation of President McKinley and the leaders of the Republican party.

"Earnest solicitation!" To do what? Abandon our plain duty, mapped out by the President himself. Again, his colleague, Mr. BRICK, stated to his indignant constituents, in the same paper, this:

I say to you it—

The 15 per cent tariff bill—is an Administration measure. You are standing by the President, you are making expansion easy and practicable, you are blessing the Puerto Rican people when you support this measure.

This interview has never been disputed. "Making expansion easy!" You are making "expansion easy and practicable" when you pervert the principles of our Constitution—indeed, its very words—which says that our tariff duties shall be levied uniform "throughout the United States." You must undermine the principles that have upheld this country for over a hundred years to make "expansion easy and practicable." We must abandon our "plain duty" to ourselves and to these people to make "expansion easy and practicable." We make "expansion easy and practicable" by stripping the Puerto Rican people of their natural right of free trade with all the world.

If we must rob these people of their liberty, if we must grind into powder the American Constitution, if we must break our promises to these people, if we must turn our backs upon our friends in need, as these people were, who willingly yielded their allegiance to the Stars and Stripes, who love our institutions and our flag, who are now a part of us, to "make expansion easy and practicable," may the God of heaven visit a prohibition on such an unpatriotic and un-American act. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But I introduce another witness. In a carefully-prepared interview, a column in length, in this same paper, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], the secretary of the Republican national machine for making Presidents against the will of the people, who, in voting for this measure, brought down the wrath of his constituents, to appease whom, said:

I realized throughout all much doubt. I felt justified in my course, supported as I was by a united party, with six exceptions, and under the leadership of the Executive, who is the head of our party.

This interview has never been disputed, and is published in the Indianapolis Journal, a Republican sheet, of March 6.

"Under the leadership of the Executive, who is the leader of his party," he says he supported this measure, and that, "with six exceptions," his party was unanimous. Mr. Chairman, the day will come when those "six exceptions" will be canonized by the American people. They are known. Their names are familiar to every household on the American continent. "Their fame is no more to be hemmed in by State lines than their patriotism is capable of being circumscribed within the same narrow limits." [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL], a leading Republican, was addressing the House on February 21, and used this language:

Now, I presume, the gentleman who is about to interrupt me [Mr. DALZELL] is prepared to say, as I am informed he has said to others, that the President is in favor of this bill. I do not dispute that, but I say that no longer ago than day before yesterday a representative of one of the great Republican papers of this country was sent to the President of the United States by his paper for the purpose of ascertaining the views of the President. The paper wanted to support the Presidential policy; they wanted to know whether they should continue editorially the support of the position the President had taken in his message; and the representative of that paper was assured at that time, no longer ago than day before yesterday, that the President was of the same opinion still and that the paper should go on as it had been doing.

Mr. DALZELL did not dispute this statement and has not to this good hour, so far as I know.

Now listen, gentlemen. This "great Republican paper" wanted to know February 19 last whether it should continue editorially the support of the position the President had taken in his message—that is, his free-trade or "plain-duty" policy—and the representative of that paper was assured at that time, by the President, that the President was of the same opinion still and that the paper should go on as it had been doing.

That speech, Mr. Chairman, was delivered February 21. Now, let us study that. The newspaper wanted to know if they should continue to support his free-trade policy, his "plain-duty" policy, and the President informed the great newspaper to continue parading before the American people his pretended position, his free-trade position, while at the same time the President was lobbying with the members of this House to carry through this House a measure imposing a tariff of 15 per cent.

Did the American people ever hear of such a humiliating, such an outrageous, such an unpatriotic and weak position taken by any President we have ever had? So weak he can not stand alone and do his "plain duty" with even six leaders of his party in this House and as many more in the Senate plus the Democratic party in Congress and 76,000,000 people, and all because the sugar and tobacco lords oppose his free-trade policy!

The able lawyer who opposed this bill as unconstitutional and otherwise wrong, the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], says he voted for the bill "at the request of the President" in an undisputed interview in the Washington Post of March 27, which I will insert in my remarks:

[Interview in Washington Post, March 27, 1900.]

VERMONT AFLAME FOR FREE TRADE.

Representative H. H. POWERS, who has returned from a week's trip to his home in Vermont, said yesterday that he was surprised at the sentiment for free trade prevailing in the Green Mountain State. "I heard talk in favor of free trade and in condemnation of the tariff everywhere I went," said he. "The Vermonters are ridiculing the idea of Puerto Rico not being a part of this country and under our Constitution. Many of the voters illustrate the absurdity of such a doctrine with quaint illustrations quite to the point."

"On what do they base their objections to a tariff?" he was asked.

"Oh, they call up the proclamation made by General Miles," replied Judge POWERS. "They tell one that the islands came under our rule without resistance, and that it is a breach of faith for us now to set up a barrier and tell them that they are not a part of the United States. I do not suppose they care so much for the legal arguments of the case; they look at the matter from the standpoint of squareness and fair dealing."

"But it is generally believed that the people of New England are paying little attention to the Puerto Rican question, and care little whether there be tariff or free trade."

RESPECT FOR M'KINLEY'S POLICY.

"Well, as far as political support of their members of Congress is concerned," answered Judge POWERS, "the voters may not waver in their loyalty. I told my people that I was for free trade; they knew I had made a speech in favor of free trade. I explained that I voted for the tariff bill after it had been modified, and that I did so at the request of the President."

Mr. Chairman, let me read from the Constitution a passage that has not been read in the House during this session. Speaking of the President's duties, section 3, Article II, says:

He [President] shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

And what else? The Constitution says furthermore that "he shall take care that the laws are faithfully executed," which, by abandoning his "plain-duty" policy, he fails to do, because the law is, our duties must be uniform throughout the domain of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, he is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and by the same provision of the Constitution he is required "from time to time" to recommend to Congress such "measures" as he shall "judge necessary and expedient" and at the same time give us information on the state of the Union, "our great Republic"—we find in his message, saying that it was "our plain duty"—his duty and the duty of Congress—to give to Cuba and Puerto Rico free trade.

Yet we find this same great magistrate, who is sworn to support the Constitution, lobbying against the very message which he has sent under the mandate of the Constitution to Congress, pushing through Congress a measure diametrically opposed to every proposition which he, in cold black ink, upheld by his Cabinet and his Secretary of War, Mr. Root, had previously recommended to Congress. But here is the reprehensibility of his position particularly: Congress as such does not find him saying that he has changed his views; that he finds it not to be his "plain duty" to do as suggested in his message, but to do something directly opposite to it.

Mr. Chairman, Congress is entitled to have his reasons for his change. There is no question that he has changed. The Speaker of this House, who administers the parliamentary law of this great body with such preeminent fairness, justice, and openheartedness as to commend him most kindly to everyone in this House, says, in an open letter, that he is "cooperating with the President" and two or three great Senators in supporting this measure that imposes upon these cyclone-swept people this tariff. I quote the distinguished Speaker's words:

What the Senate is going to do is problematical. It has its share of cowards. The Senate is always the body upon which the great interests concentrate their efforts to defeat proper legislation. But this fact remains, that I have the knowledge that I have done my simple duty, and have done it in consultation and in cooperation with the President of the United States, whose heart is quick to feel the afflictions of this little island; I have done it in conference with such men as ALLISON, FORAKER, and the earnest patriots of the Senate.

Then clearly the President abandoned, and early in the fight, his "plain duty."

Mr. Chairman, the President has said a great many beautiful things. He seems to say them because they are beautiful. He has said more beautiful things, he has been more of a Chesterfield on more occasions, than any other man who ever occupied the White House. And then he is charming beyond expression to all of those who have the honor of being in his presence.

He has repeatedly said, "Our flag does not mean one thing here and another thing in Cuba or Puerto Rico." He uttered those words on August 25 before 20,000 Methodist people at Ocean Grove and elsewhere. If our flag means something different in Puerto Rico now than in 1899, why not give his reasons to Congress? Or at least let him hang himself on the hind end of a Pullman car, as he has often done, and tell the people that the American flag means something in Puerto Rico, something different from what it has always meant here, which is the protection to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness, inalienable rights, and their complete protection by the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, the President, gifted in beautiful declamation, has said that "imperialism does not lurk in the minds of the American people." How many times has that sweet sentence fallen upon our willing ears! Yet, Mr. Chairman, the very thing that the Republican party, headed by the President, is doing now shows that imperialism not only lurks in America, but that it lurks about the precincts of Republican Congressional legislation, and that it means, as it does and will always mean, that humanity shall be controlled by the dictum of individuals and not by a written Constitution. But I must hurry on.

Mr. Chairman, I have proven the President has changed from his "plain-duty" policy, and I contend Congress is entitled to know his reasons. He has changed on his imperialism policy, and we are entitled to know his reasons from "time to time." But it may be he changes so often he has not the time. [Applause.] But instead of that we find, Mr. Chairman, to use the very significant, always interesting, language of my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] in that remarkable Republican caucus, "Now, look here; I want to know what the President wants done. I will not take any whispering here under broad-brimmed hats."

Mr. Chairman, he was right; and the American Congress wants to know what the President thinks about his "plain duty;" and if he has any fundamental reasons for changing his views, let him give them to Congress, and not whisper them around under the sombreros of the Republican party. The Constitution nowhere says, and never will say, thank God, that the President must give his views to the Republican party. It says his message must be given to the Congress of the United States; and in addition to that, to giving it to us regularly from time to time, he must do so from time to time as the exigencies of the case may require. Here is an opportunity at hand.

Mr. Chairman, the President has changed from the plain duty he owed Congress and himself as President, the people of Puerto Rico, and our country at large. He was reminded of the fact that he owed a plain duty to his party that placed him in the White House and turned Congress over to the Republicans that now control it. Clearly, he has put duty to party above duty to country. The sugar lords and tobacco kings representing the trusts, the friends and allies of him and his party, demanded that he abandon his plain duty and bend his knee, and he and his party have done so.

The people of Puerto Rico had free trade with Spain before we annexed this island to the United States. Spain has barred the people of Puerto Rico from her markets, and now we bar them, and yet they are part of us. Our forefathers said to King George they would no longer stand this very thing—that rather than longer remain slaves they would die. And now we are about to do for the people of Puerto Rico what we dare not and have no power to do with the people of the States of this Union and our old Territories.

Can we do this and longer say that ours is a land of the free and the home of the brave? Can we do this and say, as we have said in the past, and prove it, that our country is the asylum for the oppressed of all nations? Mr. Chairman, I was delighted during my recent illness to read the dulcet strains of my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], who in this House some twelve months ago said that the Puerto Ricans, when our Army marched into the confines of that little island, received us without bullets; that we greeted them with the American flag, the emblem of liberty and justice.

And, said the distinguished orator, the demonstration of these soon-to-be-reenslaved people was like "an old-fashioned Fourth of July celebration." [Great applause.] And in my heart of hearts, though writhing in pain, I asked myself the question, If our Army were to again go there, or if the American Congress was to go there, if the reception this good and brave people once gave our representatives would be an old-fashioned or a new-fashioned Fourth of July reception? [Applause.] And I asked myself another question, When will it be that these poor people, if the Republican party continues in power, have their Fourth of July celebration? [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, methinks I know when. It will be when that unterrified, unbent, and unpurchasable leader and patriot, William J. Bryan, is in yonder White House as President of this Republic. When that occurs, as it will, then these poor people will meet, whether in summer or winter, in spring or fall, and make for themselves a day of celebration, and call it their "Fourth of July." For under the administration of our great leader deliverance will come to these soon-to-be-enslaved people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STOKES. I desire, Mr. Chairman, before taking the floor, to yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MIERS] such time as he desires.

[Mr. MIERS of Indiana addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. STOKES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. HAUGEN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is anybody else who wants to be heard in general debate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides on page 31 that "the employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry outside of the city of Washington may hereafter, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be granted leave of absence not to exceed 15 days in any one year."

That provision does justice, even though it may be but limited justice, to the employees mentioned. I rise more particularly now to call the attention of members of the House to the condition which prevails with reference to employees in all the Executive Departments here in the city of Washington.

This system has brought protests from all familiar with its operations and not interested as beneficiaries, and from the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] on account of the abuse of the sick-leave privileges granted to employees. His suggestions in 1897 on that subject are germane and appropriate now. Under the rules of the Executive Departments, employees in Washington who labor seven hours a day are granted a vacation leave of thirty days with pay, and in addition to that they are granted a sick-leave vacation of thirty additional days with pay.

Under the provisions of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, contained in section 7, page 316, volume 30, United States Statutes at Large, 1897 to 1899, is found a law giving to the select Government clerks and employees in the Executive Departments at Washington special privileges and advantages.

These positions in Washington, with the large salaries paid, with their usual and reasonable burdens, are considered sinecures, and are sought after by thousands of good, industrious, and intelligent men and women from every State in the Union. Under these conditions no reasons exist why they should be singled out as special favorites of the Government and given benefits not accorded to other employees who labor with equal fidelity and efficiency and whose only misfortune seems to be that they are not residents of Washington and of the District of Columbia.

The oft-repeated sentiment, "Equal rights to all, special privileges to none," would seem to have an application here.

In 1897 the number of Department employees who availed themselves of the sick-leave privileges was astounding, and I understand that the same general abuse exists to-day, and the same amount of sickness prevails. We know that the climate of Washington is healthy, the air salubrious, and the water and the food not objectionable; and there is no condition that would produce the degree of sickness that is evinced by the number of clerks that are granted this sick-leave absence. Sixty per cent of the Government employees after receiving thirty days' leave of absence with pay availed themselves of this sick-leave privilege, as shown by this previous report. I believe that the members should protest against this system, especially when we know that some of the Departments are so far back in their work, and especially can this be said of the Pension Department.

The law now in force amended in part the act passed by the Fifty-second Congress, found in Statutes at Large, volume 27, page 715, which law is the first I have been able to find giving such exclusive privileges to Washington department employees. The former law gave to such of these clerks and employees as were specially ambitious to get pay without rendering services and who could make themselves believe that they were sick, either in fact or in imagination—this law of 1893 gave such the opportunity of getting ninety days each year, vacation and sick leave, with full pay. An abridgment of this privilege was ingrafted on the bill of March, 1898, and this allowance is now limited to sixty days for sick and vacation leaves.

The law as it exists, so far as applicable to this subject, provides that—

Hereafter it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Executive Departments, in the interest of the public service, to require of all clerks and other employees, of whatever grade or class, in their respective Departments, not less than seven hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or Executive order: * * * Provided further, That the head of any Department may grant thirty days' annual leave with pay in any one year to each clerk or employee: And provided further, * * * when a clerk or employee is personally ill, and when to limit the annual leave to thirty days in any one calendar year would work peculiar hardship, it may be extended, in the discretion of the head of the Department, with pay, not exceeding thirty days in any one case or in any one calendar year.

It will be seen how a provision like this may be abused by people upon whom the burdens of official duty do not sufficiently rest to bring efficiency to the public service.

Now, to show how the former law was abused, I desire to read from the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, General BINGHAM, chairman of the committee presenting the measure at that time, and on whose advocacy and on the report of whose committee the present law limiting to sixty days this privilege was enacted. He said:

To-day the Departments in Washington grant leaves of absence of thirty days with pay, which is called "vacation absence." It next takes up those cases of sick—sick because of contagious diseases in the family or individually sick—and may allow in such cases an additional thirty days. Besides that, when a case is specially meritorious, it is allowed thirty days more. You will find in the appendix to the report of the committee, on page 24, the correspondence with all of the Departments of the Government, wherein we have asked them to submit to what extent this leave-of-absence privilege has been carried, and the report shows in a table on page 24—and I need not go into details—the extent to which it has been carried.

There seems to have been a lack of care in the administration of this privilege under existing law. There has been a general acceptance, perhaps an unreasonable availing, on the part of subordinate officials of the Government, of the privileges of the law; but all we desire at the present time is to make this limitation of thirty days, as now provided by the law, and thirty days under specific restrictions, in meritorious cases, for the prevalence of obnoxious and contagious diseases in the families of the departmental employees, or where the clerk or subordinate is personally ill.

And as the Government is generous not only in its compensation to its subordinate force, of seven hours of labor, but generous in a thirty-days' leave of absence, the twelfth of a year, generous in its recognition of physical distress in family, or disease or inability by sickness on the part of the subordinate to perform work, to the extent of thirty days more, we claim, as was exhibited to us in our every investigation, that the Departments of this Government are behind in their work; and the logical conclusion is that they are behind in their work because of the thirty days' leave of absence, one-twelfth of a year, to the entire subordinate force.

The exhibit will also show an exceedingly large percentage, in some cases running to 60 per cent, of the entire subordinate force of a Department on sick leave during the fiscal year.

This special Washingtonian system is not only an unjust discrimination against Government employees outside of the capital, but is an unjust discrimination against the faithful and conscientious employee here who will not feign illness to get the benefit of the sick leave.

The bill now before the House allowing a vacation of but fifteen days to the employees of the Department outside of Washington is certainly an indorsement of my views by the distinguished chairman in charge, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and of his committee reporting this bill, and emphasizes the inequalites in, and injustice of, this system.

Why is it that the mail carrier over the country can only secure fifteen days when the clerks and employees in Washington get sixty days with pay? Why is it that other employees of the Government all over the country, who are rendering equally efficient services, and in most instances for less pay, are limited to a vacation of fifteen days, when these are so specially favored in Washington with seven hours a day labor and sixty days vacation and sick-leave privileges?

I mention this matter now to call the attention of the members of the House to it, and to the great number of deserving, available, and patriotic people who are willing to take these places in Washington, and are willing to take these offices, rendering full services for the full pay accorded, and without having this sixty-day privilege of leave of absence each year with pay. I hope that the proper committee, having special information and special charge of this branch of the service, will permit a bill to be reported favorably, destroying this system, which encourages idleness and which promotes sickness in the District of Columbia.

I hope that some measure for the correction of this abuse will be presented to this House and passed, and then if those who are now in the service can not submit to the burden of a law which makes them work for at least eleven months in the year for twelve months' pay, and work seven hours a day, then their places will be filled by others who are willing to do so. I wanted to call attention to this matter, and this was an appropriate time. The gentleman in charge of this bill and his committee are not unreasonable in asking for a vacation leave of fifteen days to those outside of Washington, and this provision is more to be commended than the one that gives to Washington employees of the same and all other Departments sixty days' vacation. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. SPALDING].

[Mr. SPALDING addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that no one on the other side of the House desires to participate further in this debate, and as there is no one on this side who wishes to speak, I move, with the consent of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], that we proceed with the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule; and an agreement has been made between the gentleman and myself that the debate under the five-minute rule shall be confined strictly to the bill itself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? If not, the Clerk will proceed to read the bill.

Mr. BALL. I understand the arrangement was that general debate should continue until 1 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But by unanimous consent we can dispense with that order.

Mr. BALL. I do not wish to participate in any debate, but I think it would be proper that no amendments be voted on to-day.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman will have his opportunity for further discussion under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BALL. I do not care to indulge in any discussion. My only concern is that some gentlemen interested in particular parts of this bill were under the impression that it would not be taken up to be voted on under the five-minute rule until to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The matter was very clearly stated when the order was made in regard to general debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, debate in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has been exhausted, and therefore the rule would be to proceed with the five-minute debate for the consideration of the bill by paragraphs. No unanimous consent is necessary. We are compelled to do it. There is nothing else to do. Of course we can not control the question as to whether amendments shall be offered or voted upon. If amendments are offered and a vote is called for, we can not help it. That is all.

Mr. BALL. I have no objection, personally, to proceeding with the consideration of the bill. But a number of gentlemen are absent, with the understanding that the general debate would be continued until 1 o'clock to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already directed the Clerk to proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Division of Forestry: One forester, who shall be chief of division, $2,500; 1 superintendent of working plans, who shall be assistant chief of division, $1,800; 1 clerk class 2, $1,400; 1 clerk class 1, $1,200; 1 clerk, $900; 1 clerk, $720; in all, $8,520.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, relative to that paragraph or provision of the bill, What are the duties of the persons who are to be appointed under this provision?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This paragraph carries only the statutory salaries of the Division of Forestry, mostly expert foresters who are looking after the preservation of the forests of the country; teaching the preservation of them and the general questions relating to lumbering—what trees to cut and what should not be cut, etc.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Have they any duties in connection with the reservations which are set aside by Executive proclamation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have not. Their duties are entirely different.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has the United States any other forest reservations than those set aside by Executive proclamation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the United States has not. But the gentleman is aware that there are forests all over the country, and this is for the purpose of teaching the proper method of preserving them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And this is expert work?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And does not intend to allow supervision and control of the forest reservations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Animal Quarantine Stations: To purchase, establish, and maintain quarantine stations, and to provide proper shelter and equipment for the care of neat cattle and domestic animals imported, at such ports as may be deemed necessary, $50,000 (to be immediately available).

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the paragraph just read I wish to call the attention of this committee to the great need of this quarantine station. The Government has for many years occupied leased grounds at Garfield, N. J., for quarantine purposes. The Government erected and owns the buildings. These barns—or rather sheds—are in a neglected and tumble-down condition. The sanitary situation is simply horrible, endangering the health of the valuable stock compelled to be quarantined therein, and the necessity for this appropriation is apparent.

I wish to insert in the RECORD, for the benefit of the House and for the information of the country, a brief extract from the Country Gentleman relating to this matter and setting forth the conditions of these buildings.

The article referred to is as follows:

The first thing to attract attention was the frightful condition of the roadways and the generally run-down appearance of the whole place. Samples of water from each well were secured in bottles by the inspectors for analysis, and almost every sample was of a dirty color, due, Mr. Miller said, to quicksand at the bottom of the wells. The water certainly looked unfit for use. Any breeder who at home is particularly careful to give his animals clear and pure water has every reason for complaint. This same water is believed to have caused scours in many animals recently, and owners were compelled to erect temporary boilers to sterilize it.

The wells in nearly all cases are directly alongside of barns—"barns" is a misnomer; they are simply sheds—and the drainage from the sheds can hardly escape the wells. The place is the last in the world one would select for a quarantine station. It is a series of hills and dales, with the cattle sheds on the former, the latter composed of swamps and brush 2 or 3 feet high. The writer saw cattle wading in mud, ankle deep. The yards back of the sheds, where the cattle range, slope abruptly, and at the bottom of nearly every one may be found stagnant pools of water where the cattle drink, unless tethered, which is not generally the case. The yards are usually close together, and being very hilly, the washings from one yard find their way into adjoining ones.

The manure is placed uncovered at the end of each shed, and much of it was in a steaming condition when seen. In many places manure was scattered over fields on the grounds. It was stated to our representative by good authority that afterbirth of cows was thrown into manure heaps and that much of the manure was sold to a farmer, living a short distance from quarantine, for fertilizer, and carted to him over the public highway, where cattle graze along the roadside. Cattle are placed in quarantine to ascertain if they have any infectious or contagious disease. During that period they should be looked on as suspected and treated as such. To dispose of offal in the manner stated is to leave animals open to possible infection from this source. Farmers are frequently told in bulletins issued by the United States Department of Agriculture to erect the best sanitary barns to insure the health of their animals and to look carefully after the excrement of the animals when disease is suspected. Does the Department practice what it preaches? The sheds for the accommodation of animals are ill lighted and the floors are almost on the ground.

One importer said he could not keep the stalls dry where the cattle stand, as the boards were so rotten they absorbed all the urine. The trenches back of the cattle for the reception of manure and urine were in a similar condition. If one pressed his foot in the ditch, the urine immediately appeared on the surface, and none seemed to run off at end of shed, for there was not a sufficient slant to gutter for it so to do. The only ventilation is through small windows above the heads of the cattle. These are dropped down on a little shelf, but no pure air reaches the cattle that stand so close to the side of the barn as to be constantly breathing their own breath. There was no ventilator for the carrying off of foul odors. In summer large doors at either end of the sheds might be thrown open as occasion demanded, but in cold weather, when closed, the air the cattle breathe must certainly be refreshing! Around many of the sheds and outside of doors were standing pools of discolored water. In some of the sloping yards where cattle grazed large stumps of trees were conspicuous, which are very dangerous if the cattle should ever happen to slip.

The property consists of 57 acres of about as poor land as could be selected for the purpose, although we are informed the selection was made by a cattle commission appointed by the United States Treasury Department, consisting of an editor of a Western live-stock paper and two prominent veterinarians. There are 22 cattle sheds, which will accommodate 500 to 600 animals, varying in size and holding from 18 to 60 animals each. Northeast of the grounds is the Passaic River. Along its banks are a number of manufactories, the refuse from which finds its way into the river. To the right of the superintendent's house is a small pond which empties into the Passaic and into which flows the water from the various pools on the grounds, thus affording another avenue for infection of cattle along the river banks.

The receiving and shipping station is situated on the northwestern part of the grounds, the outgoing cattle passing over the same platform as the incoming, instead of having two separate stations. This, too, is in very poor condition. There are two roadways leading from the platform, one for the passage of incoming animals, the other for outgoing; but we learn from an onlooker that the same passageway has been frequently used for both purposes. Another source of infection, if disease exists.

Importers, moreover, have had great difficulty in having animals examined promptly after arrival in port. They have been compelled sometimes, we are told, to wait days before the Government officials at quarantine would make an examination. In several cases, the story goes, they came to examine animals late in the afternoon, and informed owners that they could not work overtime, and made other remarks that were interpreted as being a strong bid for a "tip." On receiving it, the animals were speedily examined and forwarded to the quarantine station. One man is said to have recently paid $30 and another $10 to expedite delivery.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Entomological investigations: Promotion of economic entomology; investigating the history and habits of insects injurious and beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, and arboriculture; ascertaining the best means of destroying those found to be injurious; investigations in apiculture; purchase of chemicals, insecticide apparatus, and other materials, supplies, and instruments required in conducting such experiments and investigations; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere; freight and express charges, and necessary traveling expenses; preparing, illustrating, and publishing the results of the work of the division, $20,000.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Idaho.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "arboriculture," on line 12, page 13, as follows:
"Including an investigation into the ravages of the coddling moth, with a view of ascertaining the best method of its extermination."

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in order that the Department of Agriculture—and this particular branch of the Department—may investigate the habits, characteristics, and ravages of the codling moth, which has been so destructive to the fruit industry throughout the United States, and particularly the far Northwest. It is believed that a parasite has been discovered which will tend to destroy this pest and relieve the fruit growers from its ravages. Certain sections of the country are comparatively free from its destructive effects on account of the presence of this parasite to which I refer or for other reasons not yet thoroughly understood. Numbers of the States are conducting investigations along this line which are more or less successful, but it is believed that in order to complete the remedy a general investigation should be undertaken by the Government itself and through this division of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, the evil complained of and which this amendment is intended to reach is one of far-reaching effect. It is the most destructive insect to apple and pear culture known to the United States. Its destructive work has brought about a loss to this country of many millions of dollars annually. Its general habits and character are fairly well understood, but I undertake to say that a thorough investigation by the Division of Entomology will result in such a knowledge of the subject as will result in great good to those who have suffered so severely from its work in the past.

We already know that it can be successfully attacked and its destructive results very materially lessened. This has been demonstrated by practical tests, particularly in the far West. I can conceive of no field where the work of the Division of Entomology can be more effective of good results than along this particular line. It may not be inopportune to say in this connection that the Department of Agriculture is to-day rendering better service in the interests of the people than ever before in its history. Its work is being felt and appreciated by those engaged in this great industry throughout the country, particularly in the arid regions of the West, which I have the honor to in part represent. My district, which embraces the State of Idaho, is rapidly coming to the front as a fruit-producing section. Thousands of acres are already planted, including nearly all the deciduous fruits known to the Temperate Zone.

Owing to the character of our soil and climate, which are both particularly favorable, we produce as fine apples as are raised anywhere in the world. Samples of this fruit have been sent to the Pomologist of the Department, who has skillfully and artistically imitated them in wax for the Paris Exposition, so that a Jonathan apple from Ada County, Idaho, will represent the United States at that great exposition as the most ideal apple of this variety ever produced.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, if the Government will assist us in this investigation, to the end that we may effectively combat this destructive insect, the time will come when the apple industry of the far Northwest will be one of the most important of the country. I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment. On the contrary, I accept it, but suggest that it be inserted in line 13, after the word "injurious."

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. That is satisfactory to me.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Grass and forage-plant investigation and animal foods, Division of Agrostology: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to conduct investigations of grasses, forage plants, and animal foods; to employ local and special agents and assistants; to collect and purchase seeds, roots, and specimens of valuable economic grasses and forage plants for investigation, experimental cultivation, and distribution, and for experiments and reports upon the best methods of extirpating Johnson and other noxious and destructive grasses; to purchase tools, materials, apparatus, and supplies; to pay freight, express charges, and traveling expenses, and labor required in conducting experiments; to prepare drawings and illustrations for circulars, reports, and bulletins; and the agricultural experiment stations are hereby authorized and directed to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in establishing and maintaining experimental grass stations, for determining the best methods of caring for and improving meadows and grazing lands, the use of different grasses and forage plants, and their adaptability to various soils and climates, the best native and foreign species for reclaiming overstocked ranges and pastures, for renovating worn-out lands, for binding drifting sands and washed lands, and for turfing lawns and pleasure grounds, and for solving the various forage problems presented in the several sections of our country, $17,000: Provided, That $6,000 of the amount hereby appropriated be used to purchase and collect seeds, roots, and specimens of valuable and economic grasses and forage plants, to be distributed to the various experiment stations in the several States and Territories, to be by them used, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, to ascertain their adaptability to the various soils and climates of the United States: And provided further, That not more than $6,000 of the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended for salaries in the city of Washington, D. C.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 4, page 20, after the word "grasses," insert:
"And for experiments and reports upon the best methods of destroying prairie dogs."

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is a fact well known to everybody who lives in the arid parts of the United States that prairie dogs destroy more grass than is destroyed by any other animal, and it is very necessary that there should be some experiments along the line indicated in this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment. It hardly belongs in that paragraph, but I have no objection to it.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to have that amendment again read. I remember reading Washington Irving on the prairie dog, when I was a boy, and I should like to know whether the dog is to be injured or not.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The intention of this amendment is to discover means for his destruction.

Mr. LACEY. What is the matter with the shotgun?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is not effective.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] asks that the amendment be again read. If there be no objection, it will be again reported.

The amendment was again read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Agricultural experiment stations: To carry into effect the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1887, entitled "An act to establish agricultural experiment stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," and to enforce the execution thereof, $780,000; $33,000 of which sum shall be payable upon the order of the Secretary of Agriculture, to enable him to carry out the provisions of section 3 of said act of March 2, 1887, and $12,000 of which sum may be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report to Congress upon the agricultural resources and capabilities of Alaska; and to establish and maintain agricultural experiment stations in said Territory, including the erection of buildings and all other expenses essential to the maintenance of such stations, of which sum $5,000 shall be immediately available; and the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe the form of the annual financial statement required by section 3 of said act of March 2, 1887; shall ascertain whether the expenditures under the appropriation hereby made are in accordance with the provisions of the said act, and shall make report thereon to Congress; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ such assistants, clerks, and other persons as he may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and to incur such other expenses for office fixtures and supplies, stationery, traveling, freight, and express charges, illustration of the Experiment Station Record, bulletins and reports, as he may find essential in carrying out the objects of the above acts, and the sums apportioned to the several States shall be paid quarterly in advance.

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to furnish to such institutions or individuals as may care to buy them copies of the card index of agricultural literature prepared by the Office of Experiment Stations and charge for the same a price covering the additional expense involved in the preparation of these copies, and he is hereby authorized to apply the moneys received toward the expense of the preparation of the index. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain an agricultural station in the Hawaiian Islands, including the erection of buildings, the printing (in the Hawaiian Islands), illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins, and all other expenses essential to the maintenance of said station, $10,000, which sum shall be immediately available. To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report to Congress on the agricultural resources and capabilities of Porto Rico, with special reference to the selection of locations for agricultural experiment stations, and the determination of the character and extent of agricultural experiments immediately demanded by the condition of agriculture in that island, and to prepare, print, publish, and distribute in Porto Rico circulars of inquiry and bulletins of information in the English and Spanish languages, $5,000, which sum shall be immediately available.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman if this establishes a separate head of the Agricultural Department in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does this establish a separate department of agriculture there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; simply an experiment station.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Under the genera head?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Under the general management of the Department.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I notice this paragraph carries an appropriation of some $780,000 for the purpose of carrying into execution the provisions of the act of 1887, which is limited to the following purposes:

And in order to aid in acquiring and diffusing among the people of the United States useful and practical information on subjects connected with agriculture and to promote scientific investigation and experiment respecting the principles and application of agricultural science, there shall be established, etc.

Now, it seems to me this is a very large sum of money. This appropriation is constantly increasing, and I should like to know from the chairman of the committee what the committee found upon investigation to justify this large appropriation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the gentleman will read a little further, he will see that the law provides that $15,000 shall be annually distributed to each one of these stations, and that the lump sum of this appropriation has not been increased, excepting for the three new experimental stations—one in Alaska, one in the Hawaiian Islands, and one in Puerto Rico.

Mr. CORLISS. Is it not true that this appropriation has gradually and persistently increased in every Congress?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it is the same as in the last Congress with the addition of Hawaii and Puerto Rico. Alaska was in the last bill.

Mr. CORLISS. This money is appropriated and given to the States?

Mr. WADSWORTH. To these different stations.

Mr. CORLISS. Is it distributed under the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is distributed under the authority given in that law which you have just quoted and appropriated for in this agricultural appropriation bill, and the money goes to the experiment stations, not to the State.

Mr. CORLISS. Does the chairman of the committee think that this appropriation is not excessive?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think it is excessive. It is the same as it has been for the last few years.

Mr. STEELE. I want to ask the gentleman about Alaska, whether or not the experiments of last year seem to justify further experiments in Alaska?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In answer to the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that the gentlemen who visited that far-off territory reported some facts which seem to cast a shadow of doubt at least upon the utility of that station; but after consulting with the Secretary of Agriculture and talking the matter over with him, he mailed me a letter which I have here and which I will have the Clerk read, if the gentleman from Indiana desires it. If not, I will ask leave to print it in the RECORD, as it is quite long.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1900.

DEAR SIR: I beg leave to offer the following reasons for my request that $15,000 be appropriated for the maintenance of the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska.

First. The success of our investigations, as far as they have gone, indicates that the agricultural possibilities of that vast region surpass the most sanguine expectations of the friends of the Territory.

The history of these investigations is briefly as follows: For thirty years after the acquisition of the Territory the Government did absolutely nothing to ascertain whether or not anything to support life could be grown there. On the theory that it was simply a vast ice box, in which no civilized person would want to live or could live, it was left severely alone. In 1897 Congress authorized this Department, at my request, to begin investigations in a tentative way. A commission was sent up to examine the country. Their report to Congress was sufficiently encouraging for Congress to direct a continuance of the work for 1898. That year the Department began actual experiments in growing grains and vegetables on a small scale, using for that purpose gardens tendered by citizens of Sitka and Skagway. These experiments are recorded in detail in last year's report to Congress. Briefly stated, the results were that barley and oats matured and produced grain of excellent quality and a superior article of fiber flax was grown, as were also all the common hardy vegetables.

Reservations of land for experimental purposes were made at Sitka and Kodiak and Kenai, Cook Inlet. On the strength of these results the last Congress increased the appropriation for these investigations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and the law directed the establishment and maintenance of experiment stations in Alaska. As this indicated the purpose of Congress to place the work on a permanent basis, plans were laid accordingly. A headquarters building was begun and partly completed, land was cleared, and experiments begun in the drainage and treatment of the soil. Experimental crops were grown at the stations at Sitka and Kenai, in Cook Inlet. The results were more successful than we had dared to hope. Eleven varieties of wheat matured a good quality of grain that will be valuable for hybridizing and for early maturing in lower latitudes, as did also a dozen kinds each of barley and oats. Both winter and spring rye matured; clovers sown the year before matured seed; fiber flax of fine quality was again produced, and so were all the common vegetables and buckwheat. Samples of the grain are in evidence at the Department, and speak for themselves. The report of these operations was transmitted to Congress some time ago.

It is evident the Territory has agricultural possibilities and the question now is how best to develop them. The appropriations have not been sufficient to begin work in the interior. For want of funds we have been obliged to confine our operations to the coast region. I now plan for the establishment of at least one experiment station in the interior the coming season with a view to ascertain what can be done in that vast region which, in its valleys and plains, contains probably not less than 100,000 square miles of land that will admit of the prosecution of agriculture in some form.

Besides the experiments carried on by our agents, reports were received from persons residing in the Territory, showing that successful attempts have been made in growing potatoes, turnips, cabbages, lettuce, and other vegetables in numerous localities along the coast and in the interior, and even in some places north of the Yukon River. Grasses and forage plants grow luxuriantly over large areas and already a considerable number of sheep and cattle are maintained in the Territory. The success of the reindeer experiments conducted by the Department of the Interior indicates that with the aid of this animal, useful for meat and work, even the northern portions of the Territory may develop considerable industries, as is the case in similar regions in Europe and Asia.

It is estimated that only about 5 per cent of the area in southeastern Alaska can be reduced to cultivation, but its very scarcity makes it all the more important that we should demonstrate to the people how to make the most of it. In the Kenai Peninsula and the Cook Inlet region there are thousands of square miles of land which can be converted into good farms, and the reports we have from the interior indicate that probably 30 or 40 per cent of the country can be utilized for farming or grazing.

Our headquarters station is located at Sitka, because it had to be located where we could reach it at all times of the year. Sitka is the seat of government; mails go there regularly. We can communicate with the men in charge at all times. It is important to locate the headquarters where they can be reached. The problems presented at Sitka in the subjugation of the land and the growing of crops are of such a nature that whatever succeeds there can succeed anywhere else in the coast region.

Secondly. This work deserves the support of Congress because it will aid materially in the development of the Territory. Alaska's mineral resources appear to be unbounded; we have not begun to measure them. In addition to this, its fur trade, its fisheries, and its wealth of timber are acknowledged to be valuable. It would aid and cheapen the cost of the development of these resources if the men who are engaged in the work can be fed from products grown in the Territory. The 100,000 people who in the near future will inhabit Alaska will be fed by San Francisco and Seattle, and the cost of their living increased by expensive transportation by sea and land unless we encourage them to produce their food stuffs themselves, if such a thing be possible.

That people can live in these latitudes and become important factors in national life is proved by the inhabitants of Norway, Sweden, and Finland. They have resided where they now live since the dawn of history, because they find agriculture possible there. Nature is no more rigorous and forbidding over a large area of Alaska than she is in these countries. If anything, she favors Alaska. I believe that the possibilities of farming in Alaska are greater in the same latitudes than in these countries, and I base my belief on geographical and meteorological data.

Comparing Finland with Alaska, I find that the northern boundary of both is latitude 70°, but while the southern boundary of Finland is 60°, the southern boundary of Alaska is 54° 30'. In 1895 Finland produced:

Wheat	bushels..	146,870
Barley	do....	6,117,402
Flax	pounds..	3,561,615
Oats and barley, mixed	bushels..	449,537
Rye	do....	13,254,842
Oats	do....	18,811,839
Hemp	pounds..	1,466,682
Buckwheat	bushels..	82,581
Peas	do....	425,250

During the same year Finland exported 22,750,000 pounds of butter and 400,000 pounds of cheese.

Finland has a population of 2,520,437 people. Meteorological observations, taken in like latitudes in Alaska and Finland, show that temperatures are higher in Alaska. So that there is every encouragement for the belief that Alaska will in the future produce food for the support of very large numbers of people.

Having made experimentation along the southern coast and learned what can be done there on a small scale, it is our intention to move northward and ascertain what can be done along and north of the Yukon River. Reports come to us incidentally that grains left on the ground by tourists have grown and matured north of the Yukon. Barley has ripened as far north as Fort Yukon in latitude 66° 45'; and on the Yukon volunteer wheat has been found ripe that had been scattered there by accident. Grains grown and ripened along the southern coast during the past year will be of great value in the scientific work of the Department and of our experiment stations, where cross fertilization is being carried on for the purpose of getting a multiplicity of varieties in order that grains may be found suitable for different conditions within the United States. The grains brought down from Alaska are exceedingly vigorous and will be valuable for seed use in our Northern States.

One of the great requirements in latitudes where spring wheat is now grown is a variety that will ripen before the hot, moist season of early July arrives, in which rust is developed. It is possible that some of our Alaska wheats, maturing rapidly there in almost perpetual sunshine, may meet this requirement; or, having early maturity impressed upon them, may be valuable in hybridization.

Experimentation along the line of reducing to cultivable condition, by underdraining, lands which now produce mosses, are being undertaken, and must be prosecuted throughout the Territory.

In view of the facts that the Territory is so extensive, and the interests involved so great, I respectfully urge that the sum of $15,000 be appropriated for the work.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, yours,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives United States, Washington, D. C.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What I desired to ask was, Are the experimental stations provided for?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They are. They were in the bill of last year.

Mr. HOPKINS. And they have proven the best of any investment you have made in that line.

Mr. STEELE. I happened to be in that country last year, Mr. Chairman, and I have very grave doubts of Alaska ever becoming an agricultural country, or any part of it. At the same time, I defer to the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture; and if it is possible to find anything that will grow and mature up there that will be of advantage to those people, I will be glad of it. I want him to try it for another year.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I think the gentleman saw but a small portion of the territory in Alaska, and I doubt very much if his opinion is of very great value to this House in connection with the agricultural resources of Alaska. In any military matter I would defer to the gentleman's usually excellent judgment; but I have in my hand, and will not detain the House by reading it, a communication from Professor Georgeson, in charge of the experimental station work in Alaska during the last two years, in which he sets forth the agricultural possibilities of Alaska, and compares the territory with the Grand Duchy of Finland.

Finland contains something more than 140,000 square miles, or about one-third the area of Alaska, with a similar climate, within about the same parallels of latitude. Finland supports a population of about two millions and a half. It is an agricultural country, producing much more than is consumed. It is the opinion of Professor Georgeson, a Scandinavian, and entirely familiar with the agricultural and climatic conditions prevailing in northern Europe, that Alaska is capable of supporting a population of from twelve to fifteen millions. And inasmuch as Russian oppression is likely to drive a large number of Finlanders to seek new homes—I hope under our flag—and as immigration is apt to follow the same parallels of latitude, we may hope to attract a valuable and industrious population to our northern country. For these reasons I think it is important that the country should have these facts. I insert this communication in the RECORD, under the general leave already given:

FACTS CONCERNING ALASKA.

Alaska lies between latitudes 54° 30' and 70° north and between longitudes 132° and 168° west. It covers an area of 580,000 square miles. So far as agriculture has been tried in a systematic manner in this Territory, it has been a success. The Department of Agriculture matured no less than 11 varieties of wheat and about a dozen varieties each of barley and oats, as well as flax and buckwheat, and also produced all the common vegetables during the past year. This was at Sitka, in about latitude 57° 30'; but reports received by the Department from all over the Territory show that the hardy vegetables can be successfully grown everywhere. There are large and successful market gardens at Dawson, north of latitude 64°.

Barley has been ripened as far north as Fort Yukon, in latitude about 66° 45'. Volunteer wheat has been found ripe at places on the Yukon where it had been accidentally scattered. The whole of southwestern Alaska, embracing the Peninsula of Alaska and the adjoining islands, is covered with an abundance of grass and, as pointed out, cattle can live and in certain localities do live outdoors the year round on this natural pasturage. While it is true that Alaska is much more mountainous than Finland, it is also true that it is more than four times larger than Finland and contains an area of land as large as Finland which can be utilized for agricultural purposes in some form.

It is further noted concerning Alaska that experiment stations have already been established at Sitka and at Kenai on the Kenai Peninsula.

That grains and vegetables have been grown with marked success at both of these places.

That the Government has erected a headquarters building at Sitka, with a view to the perpetuation of the work.

That the investments by the Government for the equipment of these stations, including buildings, work animals, and implements, so far amounts to something over $8,000.

That this property, which has been transported there at great cost, should not be abandoned or given away.

That the Department is very desirous of establishing an experiment station during the coming summer somewhere on the Yukon River, with a view to testing the agricultural possibilities of that vast region.

That in order to do this work in a systematic and scientific way it is necessary to organize the service properly and to maintain it from year to year for at least six or eight years before it can be said with certainty what may be expected in that region.

That the distances in Alaska are very great. From Seattle to Skagway is about 1,100 miles; from Sitka to Kadiak, about 800 miles; from Kadiak to Unalaska, 700 miles; from Unalaska to St. Michael, 750 miles. These distances are in straight lines across the open sea, and not along the coast lines. From St. Michael to Circle City is about 1,100 miles, up the Yukon River.

That Skagway, which is the northernmost point touched by pleasure steamers, which follow along the inland passage, is 200 miles east of the one hundred and forty-first meridian, where Alaska proper begins, and that, consequently, gentlemen who think they have seen Alaska and are prepared to pass judgment upon its possibilities when they have traveled along the inland passage and viewed the hillsides from the deck of a steamer, as a matter of fact have seen nothing of Alaska except the rocky promontories which are characteristic of southeastern Alaska. The Department does not maintain that southeastern Alaska is likely to be of any great importance agriculturally, although there is land enough to raise the food for all miners who will ever locate there.

Sitka was made the headquarters for the experiment stations because it was the seat of government. It was a place readily accessible the year round, whereas places in the interior or farther westward could not be reached at all times. The success of growing grains and vegetables and in raising live stock in Alaska are positive proof that the country has agricultural possibilities. Its resources in minerals and timber, its fisheries and fur trade, are certain to cause a large population to flow to the Territory, and it is a measure of sound political economy to encourage the development of agriculture in order to cheapen the living of those who go there and to give stability and permanence to the population.

FACTS CONCERNING FINLAND.

Area.—Finland has an area of 144,221 square miles. Of this 12 per cent consists of inland lakes.

Boundaries.—The southern boundary is in latitude 60; northern boundary, latitude 70. Alaska's southern boundary, 54° 30'; northern boundary, 70°. Latitude 60, the southern boundary of Finland, runs across Cook Inlet and the coast of the northernmost bend in the Gulf of Alaska, leaving all of southeastern Alaska and all of the peninsula of Alaska to the southward.

Population.—In 1895 the population of Finland was 2,520,437.

Crops.—In the year 1895 Finland had the following among its leading crops:

Wheat	bushels..	146,370
Barley	do....	6,117,402
Flax	pounds..	5,561,615
Oats and barley, mixed, grown for feed	bushels..	449,537
Rye	do....	13,254,342
Oats	do....	18,811,839
Hemp	pounds..	1,436,682
Buckwheat	bushels..	82,581
Peas	do....	425,250

Live stock in 1895.—Horses, 300,650; cattle, 2,398,183; sheep, 1,067,324; hogs, 197,350.

For each thousand persons Finland had, in 1895, 119 horses, 559 head of cattle, and 423 sheep.

EXPORTS.

Oats.—For the five years 1891-1895, inclusive, Finland exported yearly, on an average, 1,396,200 bushels of oats. It appears that oats is the only grain they have exported.

Live stock.—During the same period of five years Finland exported a total of 20,837 horses, 62,628 cows and calves, 7,896 sheep, and 62,582 hogs.

Dairy products.—During the same period of five years Finland exported 113,743,216 pounds of butter, which is an average yearly export of 22,750,000 pounds, in round numbers. In the same period of five years the exports of cheese amounted to 1,972,185 pounds, or nearly 400,000 pounds as a yearly average. During the same period of five years Finland exported nearly 2,000,000 gallons of milk.

As yet we do not have records for places farther north than Camp Davidson, which corresponds to the settlement now called Eagle City, located on the border between Canada and Alaska, in latitude about 64° 50′, or nearly the same as the latitude of Kajana, Finland.

Orca is located in almost the same latitude as Mustiala, namely, about 60° 45′. We do not have records from the station for more than the past summer, but it will be seen that the temperatures for the six months, June to November, inclusive, run very closely with those of Mustiala. Skagway, which is at the head of Lynn Canal and the most northerly point that pleasure steamers touch, is in latitude about 59° 30′. It will be seen that the temperatures here also correspond very closely with those of southern Finland.

As for the temperature of the coast region, the average record for more than eighty years shows that it is mild the year round. As a matter of fact, the report of the special agent who has had these investigations in charge shows that cattle have run out for years at Kadiak both summer and winter without food or care of any kind. Kadiak is located in latitude about 57° 45′, some 800 miles west of Sitka.

Mr. LLOYD. Has the gentleman any other information with reference to the capabilities of Alaska except that given by Professor Georgeson?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Oh, yes; I have, although I do not care to detain the House in the matter. I had a personal friend in the Cook Inlet country last summer. He was there for mining purposes, but he took seeds along, and raised the ordinary vegetables in his garden.

Mr. LLOYD. Is there any part of Alaska now engaged in agricultural pursuits?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. There are the Russian settlers in Cook Inlet country, who have been there a hundred years, and living there as agriculturists.

Mr. LLOYD. Have you any estimate of the amount of their products?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. No.

Mr. HOPKINS. They have eleven varieties of wheat in Alaska. They grow barley there, buckwheat, and grass, and everything of that kind is grown there for the sustenance of cattle, horses, and other kinds of live stock.

Mr. LLOYD. In that connection, I want to inquire if it is not a fact that all that is grown is grown on a very small tract of land, and nearly all grown on one tract of land?

Mr. HOPKINS. The area now under cultivation is not large; but it is not from the fact that the soil is not productive, but because of the sparseness of population. These experimental stations are placed there for the purpose of showing what developments can be made in the way of agriculture in that country. And, as the gentleman from Connecticut has said, it is three or four times as large as Finland; it is no farther north than Finland, and that country supports a population of between two and three millions of people. They raise there a large amount of all kinds of agricultural products. They have 2,398,000 cattle, more than 1,000,000 sheep, and nearly half a million horses, besides hogs and other live stock.

Now, this appropriation is to have an investigation of the subject made most carefully, to see whether this great area, that a great many people have thought heretofore was not susceptible of cultivation, can be cultivated as successfully as Finland; and, as the gentleman has said, instead of having a population of a few thousands, by proper cultivation and development of the resources of that land we can care for a population of 10,000,000 people.

Mr. STEELE. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is out of my time. The gentleman has been reading from a paper.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have not. I have been reading from nothing. I stated some facts that had come to my knowledge.

Mr. STEELE. He is reading from a paper that he has before him.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was stating a number of facts that have come to my knowledge from an investigation I have made upon this subject.

Mr. STEELE. Something that the gentleman has never given a moment's attention to until five minutes ago, probably. Now, the fact of the business is that I am a farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. No one will believe it.

Mr. STEELE. I know farming land when I see it. If I did not know more about it than Mr. Georgeson, who makes this report, or the gentleman from Connecticut, I would not claim to be a farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I have been a farmer all my life.

Mr. STEELE. A Connecticut farmer. You are not in it. You want to go to the West or South.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to suggest to the gentleman that he lives in a different country from the gentleman who lives in New England.

Mr. STEELE. I am not yielding. The truth about it is that I visited the agricultural station to which reference has been made. It consists of the governor's garden or yard and a very few other very small lots or yards. The land cultivated there has been cleared, I suppose, about a hundred years, or in that neighborhood—ever since the traders went up there.

Never until they made the appropriation of two years ago did they attempt any agriculture. At Killisnoo we found a gentleman who catches herring for the oil, and about eleven months of the year he has nothing to do. He had a little patch of ground up against his house where he was raising pansies and a few other things more adapted to deep planting, that he planted in the fall, and they came up in the spring. He said that he thought each pansy cost about a dollar apiece. He had nothing else to do; he could not fish all the time. He amused himself raising pansies and a few other plants which he could plant in the fall.

There were a few yards in Sitka where this agricultural station is. In some little patches they were trying to raise oats or wheat. I know these when I see them. I saw specimens in the committee room on Agriculture supposed to be brought from up there. But I want an affidavit from the agent that these articles ever grew in that country before I will believe it, and yet when you examine the heads, you find that they are not matured. I am not deferring to the judgment of Mr. Jordan; I want the Secretary of Agriculture by experiment to find out that it is not an agricultural country. Now, gentlemen, do not decry me as a farmer; I am an excellent farmer and know how to farm.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What do you raise mostly?

Mr. STEELE. Corn and wheat, cattle, hogs; I pull stumps, drain my land, rotate crops, etc. I know all about it.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman will have hell raised up in Indiana, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no; they raise that down South. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana in the closing sentence of his remarks indicated the extent of his knowledge of farming—that is, he announced that he knows a farm when he sees it—he knows, of course, that a farm lies outdoors. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. Not necessarily so. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is inexpedient for Congressmen to inform the public what they do not know about agriculture. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HOPKINS. Members of the committee will note, however, that all of the information that the gentleman from Indiana obtained was upon a pleasure trip, and he only visited one or two places in this country. Now, the statement that I made was that this large area of territory is as far south as Finland; and I find by examination of some statistics which I have before me that the southern boundary of Finland is 60° north, and the southern limit of Alaska is 54° and some minutes north.

I have just shown the production of Finland—that all sorts of agricultural products are raised there, that a population of between two and three millions of people are supported on an area that is only about one-quarter of the area of Alaska; and it seems to me if they are as successful as is shown here, that we ought to be equally as successful in Alaska. The gentleman from Indiana, with all his knowledge of farming, does not dispute any facts relating to Finland. Why can not we develop this great territory of ours up there as well as Finland? It seems to me that if a tithe of the information that has been furnished here is correct, and I believe the whole of it to be correct, that it is a profitable investment for this Government to go on with these experiments.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Nutrition investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the nutritive value of the various articles and commodities used for human food, with special suggestions of full, wholesome, and edible rations less wasteful and more economical than those in common use, $15,000; and the agricultural experiment stations are hereby authorized to cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out said investigations in such manner and to such extent as may be warranted by a due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States and Territories, and as may be mutually agreed upon; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to require said stations to report to him the results of any such investigations which they may carry out, whether in cooperation with said Secretary of Agriculture or otherwise.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Insert after line 2, page 24, the following:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, through the Division of Chemistry, to investigate the chemical composition of cotton seed and its economic uses, the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to include the expenses of chemical investigations, services of special agents, cost of apparatus and materials, necessary traveling expenses, and expert and other labor."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that is subject to a point of order, and I will reserve the point of order. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that what he desires can be accomplished through the Division of Chemistry and nutrition investigation, on page 23. There is full power in the Secretary to investigate the subject of cotton seed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, this section that has just been read only provides $15,000 for all purposes, and the amendment which I sent up provides $10,000 for the investigation of the economical uses of cotton-seed products.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think less than that would accomplish the purposes as thoroughly as it ought to be, and if not necessary, the use of it would not be made. It is well known to those acquainted with the cultivation and gathering of cotton that the cotton crop is more valuable and more important than any other one crop. Therefore it is more necessary that it should be so used and its uses so encouraged as to get the greatest amount of profit or value out of it.

There are more poor people in the South, more laborers, engaged in the cultivation of cotton, the picking of cotton, the preparation of it for market, than those engaged, perhaps, in connection with all other crops in the South combined. There is more money derived from foreign countries in connection with this crop than in connection with any other crop in the United States.

I know that something has been done along this line, but I do not think sufficient has been done. It is true that private individuals and companies have made sufficient and satisfactory investigations as to the food products of cotton seed; but the results of those investigations lack official confirmation, and by proper investigation of the food products of the cotton seed, we can extend the trade in those products with European and Asiatic countries.

Cotton-seed oil is a cheap substitute for many products of lard, butter, etc.; and if the nutritive properties and the harmlessness of these products were well known in Europe as well as in this country by means of official investigation, I have no doubt millions of dollars would be added to the value of the products of cotton seed in the United States.

I offer this amendment because this paragraph appropriates only $15,000 for investigation of all kinds in this direction, and I do not think the field has been sufficiently covered. I believe the same amount of money could not be expended in any other way which would be likely to result in so great benefit to so great a number of people of so large a section of our country. I offer the amendment in good faith, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order, if the amendment is subject to a point of order, and let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the chemical composition of cotton seed has been a matter of investigation with the Department of Agriculture at Washington. There have been full investigations and full reports on the subject. We find as we go on with the work of the Department of Agriculture that we must consider that the Department at some time finishes a part of its work so as to take up new work. Not only has the Department at Washington investigated the chemical constituents of cotton seed for the purpose of determining what is the best fertilizer for cotton, but it has investigated the nutritive properties of cotton seed as an animal food, and full report has been made on that subject.

One of the most interesting pamphlets issued by the Department of Agriculture—quite a long one; I think about one hundred and twenty-odd pages—is on this subject, very full in every respect, giving the chemical composition of the seed, just exactly what it is worth as a fertilizer in comparison with commercial fertilizers of every sort, just exactly what it is worth as a component part of animal food for fattening cattle, and for various other purposes.

Now, in addition to that, the agricultural experiment stations of several Southern States have undertaken this work, and several letters have been received by me and others in relation to the work which they have done. The agricultural experiment station of my own State has made some very interesting investigations along that line. The work has been attended to about as fully as it could possibly be attended to from a scientific or chemical standpoint.

Now, it may be possible that a proviso to this bill, or a separate bill, directing a report from the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of showing the harmless qualities of cotton-seed products as a substance of human food might do some good. That, however, would not come within the scope of the gentleman's amendment.

But, sir, there never has been any dispute as to the absolute harmlessness or the nutritive qualities of cotton seed, either as forming part of various food products for animals or as a substitute for olive oil, butter, lard, and all that sort of thing; nor has there been any question as to its harmless and nutritive qualities as a raw animal food, as in the case of cotton-seed cake.

Mr. SIMS. Is it not a fact that a bill is now pending to tax oleomargarine or butterine, composed largely of cotton-seed oil, on the ground that this product is not good for human food—is unhealthy?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am glad the gentleman has asked this question, because it enables me to tell the House something which will be a matter of information to some members at least. There is a bill pending for the purpose indicated by the gentleman, but not a single advocate of that bill has dared at any time to advance the idea that cotton-seed oil is not an absolutely harmless and absolutely healthful product. So that the introduction of that bill does not imply what the gentleman supposes; it is not based upon any such reason as the unhealthfulness of cotton-seed oil. I am glad to be able to make this statement, because there may be some men in the House who may think that it is on such grounds that oleomargarine legislation is being urged. No one on cross-examination before the committee has ever dared to say that cotton-seed oil was unhealthful or not nutritious.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Do you think the investigation in this direction, with reference to the use of this product for human food, is sufficiently provided for without the amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The amendment would not accomplish that.

Mr. SIMS. But my question is, Do you think the investigation has gone sufficiently far to indicate the adaptability of this product for human consumption?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It indicates to every man who desires to learn the fact that cotton-seed oil is harmless—not only harmless as human food, but is nutritious, just as much as olive oil, or any other vegetable oil known to the world, and as healthful as any other human food.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the investigations already made along the line of this proposed investigation and in view of the fact that there are $45,000 available, $30,000 under the one head and $15,000 under another, a portion of which may be used in the further pursuance of this investigation, I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Publications, Department of Agriculture: For the preparation, printing, illustration, publication, indexing, and distribution of documents, bulletins, and reports, $85,000; of which sum $37,500 shall be available for the preparation and printing of farmers' bulletins, which shall be adapted to the interest of the people of the different sections of the country, an equal proportion of two-thirds of which shall be delivered to, or sent out under the addressed franks furnished by, Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, as each Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall direct: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture shall notify Senators and Representatives of the title and character of each such bulletin, and also of any other publication of the Department of Agriculture not sent to the folding rooms of the Senate and House, with the total number to which each Senator, Representative, and Delegate may be entitled for distribution; and on the face of the envelope inclosing said bulletins shall be printed the title of each bulletin contained therein: Provided further, That all such bulletins included in the quotas of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates not called for on or before the 30th day of June in each fiscal year shall revert to the Secretary of Agriculture, and be available to him, either for miscellaneous distribution or in making up Congressional quotas for the next fiscal year; for the pay of artists, draftsmen, and engravers, and of proof readers and indexers when necessary; for the purchase of manuscript for publication, and of tools, instruments, and artists' materials; for printing proofs, charts, and maps; for drawings, engravings, photographs, paintings, lithographs, other illustrations, and electrotypes, and for traveling expenses when necessary; for labor, paper, envelopes, gum, twine, and other necessary materials; for the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $47,500; in all, $85,000.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section. In line 6, on page 25, I move to strike out "eighty" and insert the words "one hundred and;" so that it will read "$105,000."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The section to which the gentleman refers has been read and a part of the preceding section, for the purchase and distribution of seeds.

Mr. LATIMER. No; the gentleman is mistaken. I asked the attention of the Chair immediately on the conclusion of the reading of the paragraph in question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I beg pardon, but I think a part of the succeeding section was also read—the paragraph headed "Purchase and distribution of valuable seed."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is mistaken. The Clerk had just completed the paragraph relating to the publications of the Department of Agriculture when the gentleman from South Carolina offered his amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section. In a word, I desire to increase the appropriation for farmers' bulletins by the amount of $20,000; and in order that the section may be in harmony, I desire, in line 7, on page 25, to strike out the words "thirty-seven" and insert "fifty-seven," making the increase of $20,000, as I have proposed.

In line 11 I moved to strike out the words "two-thirds" and insert in lieu thereof "four-fifths."

In line 1, on page 26, strike out the word "June" and insert the word "March."

In line 15, on the same page, strike out "eighty" and insert "one hundred and;" so as to read: "in all, $105,000."

Mr. Chairman, this bill appropriates $37,500 for the purpose of printing farmers' bulletins. One-third of these bulletins are allotted to the Secretary of Agriculture and two-thirds of them are for Congressional distribution. In other words, each member of the House has allotted to him about 5,000 bulletins to be sent to his constituents. There is hardly an agricultural district in this Union that has not more than 15,000 farmers in it. There are more than 100 bulletins on different subjects, every one of them of great interest to our farmers, and yet we are denied by this committee and this appropriation the right to have more than 5,000 bulletins, hardly enough to send one-third of our constituents one each.

Why this niggardly appropriation touching a matter of such great importance? This committee has in this bill appropriated $780,000 for the experiment stations. Why spend this large sum of money in furnishing means to carry on experiments in farming? Why pay large sums of money in salaries to experts in agriculture and then refuse to print the results of these experiments? Mr. Chairman, it is this valuable information, obtained at such great cost to the Government, that the people want. Thousands of dollars are appropriated to maintain an army in Luzon for the purpose of plunder, murder, and to rob the poor Filipinos of liberty and their homes; but when we ask for the sum of $20,000 for the purpose of printing farmers' bulletins and distributing them where they will be read and prove valuable to the great agricultural interest that feed the nation and furnish two-thirds of the exports to foreign countries and that enrich this nation, we meet the complaining lawyer, not with his usual claim that it is unconstitutional, but that it is a waste and that the people do not want the bulletins because they have not asked for them.

Mr. Chairman, the people do want them, and they expect, and have a right to expect, their representation in Congress to look out for their interest and not wait to be written to for what they want, but to send them every good and valuable thing that belongs to them or that they are entitled to. Mr. Chairman, I charge this committee with disrespect to a majority of this House, when they failed to write $20,000 in the bill for increase in appropriation for farmers' bulletins. I canvassed this House with a petition to the Committee on Agriculture, asking that the appropriation for seed be increased by $40,000; for bulletins, $17,000; for agrostology, $8,000; and 226 members signed that petition. I went before this committee and urged this increase in the different items. The committee wrote in the bill $40,000 for seed and $5,000 for agrostology, and the chairman admitted upon this floor this morning that this increase was allowed in compliance with that petition, and yet they denied the increase for bulletins.

Mr. Chairman, one member stood upon this floor and charged that members who signed that petition did not know what they were signing; that seed was wanted and not bulletins. I hardly think in this great legislative body of intelligent men they will let such a statement be proven by the record when the vote has been taken. The fact is, the committee was opposed to any increase, but, thinking the increase for seed was popular, they put that in and ignored the bulletins. Now, gentlemen of this House, you who signed the request for this increase and you who believe it just to the farmers of this country, I call upon you to stand by this amendment. It has been submitted as you requested. The committee, as I have said, turned down 226 of us, and it is our turn now. Let us vote it in the bill and turn the committee down. I feel sure you will do it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to consume the time of the House. I have said about all I had to say, except that it is provided in this amendment that I have offered that on page 26, line 1, instead of "June," the word "March" shall be inserted. The object of this is that these bulletins, when unclaimed by members, may lapse to the Secretary of Agriculture, so that he may reallot them to members of the House after the 31st day of March instead of the 30th of June.

Now, it is hoped that Congress will adjourn by the 15th of June. If we leave here by that time, these bulletins, under this bill, will not lapse to the members until the 30th of June. I ask that that change may be made, so that the members of the House may have the privilege of these bulletins which may lapse on account of members not taking them. All that any member has to do in order to retain his quota is to notify the Secretary of Agriculture that he desires his quota of bulletins, which can be held there. Without this notice, let them lapse on the 31st of March, to be redistributed by the Secretary.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. LATIMER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman contemplate asking for an additional appropriation by way of an amendment to the bill to provide for additional Yearbooks, increasing the number when that part of the bill is reached?

Mr. LATIMER. No, sir; this amendment that I have offered is simply in regard to agricultural bulletins.

Mr. BUTLER. I understood the gentleman to say that he intended also to ask for an increase in the appropriation for Yearbooks. Did I misunderstand the gentleman?

Mr. LATIMER. You did. I should be glad to vote for an increase in the Yearbooks and horse books, but that is not contemplated in this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the motion to increase the appropriation by $20,000 will not prevail. The amount appropriated in the bill is the amount that has been recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture, and supplies us with 5,000 bulletins each. Now, so far as the dissemination of useful agricultural information is concerned, that number is sufficient, and doubly so for the reason that wherever a bulletin is of particular interest in a district the local papers are very glad to take it up and publish it and scatter it broadcast over that district.

Mr. LATIMER. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. LATIMER. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the Secretary of Agriculture has anything to do with the distribution of these bulletins? I ask him if that is not a thing that belongs to the members of this House, and if the Secretary did not say that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That may be so; but we must rely in a great many things upon his judgment. If you want to consider these bulletins as a part of our electioneering perquisites, 5,000 copies are only a drop in the bucket. I have thirty-five or forty thousand voters in my district. Is the House willing to give me thirty-five or forty thousand of these bulletins? The gentleman from South Carolina, I believe, has four or five thousand votes in his district. How are you going to arrange that inequality? Are you going to supply each member with a sufficient number, so that he can send one to every voter in his district? I see no good reason whatever for increasing this appropriation, and I do not think the gentleman from South Carolina has mentioned any good reason.

Mr. LATIMER. What was the statement which you made about the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I made the statement that the gentleman polls between four and five thousand votes in his district, whereas in my district there are between thirty-five and forty thousand votes, and that in order to attempt to furnish each member with the number requisite to supply each of his constituents there would be no end to it.

Mr. LATIMER. How often is it necessary to explain on this floor that when a man in the South receives a nomination for Congress at the primaries that settles the question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I never explained it before that I know of.

Mr. LATIMER. It has been repeatedly explained.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. SIMS. Why do you think the farmer who does not vote ought to be entitled to a bulletin?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is not the question before us. They want to supply every farmer who wants them. I only want the House to understand precisely what they are doing if they adopt the amendment offered. In that case I would need 35,000 or 40,000 bulletins to supply my district in accordance with the suggestions made by some gentlemen.

Mr. SIMS. A whole lot of the bulletins would go to the gentlemen who voted. No doubt they would send to those who did not vote.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If you had 35,000 bulletins, to whom would you send them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would send them to every voter in the district.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do you think they would appreciate them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Ninety per cent of them would, as I represent an agricultural district.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If they would appreciate them, why not let them have them?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the object of this publication bureau is to disseminate information upon subjects relating to agriculture. Now, I have been a member of this House for eight years, and I stand here and say that I have never during that time received a single request for an agricultural bulletin which I was not able to supply either out of my own quota or else by dropping a note to the Secretary of Agriculture and asking him to forward it. So much, then, for that. Now, as to the need of an increase of these bulletins. There is absolutely no need of it. The committee has granted every dollar for the publication of the agricultural bulletins which was asked for by the Secretary of Agriculture and by the Chief of the Division of Publication. Moreover, we have granted all we need for the purpose of distribution as proved by the experience of each one of you.

Now, as to this "canvass of the House" which was made by the gentleman from South Carolina, from what I understand from gentlemen upon this floor, and I know what seven or eight of them said to me, is this: That they understood the petition to be for an increase of the seed to be distributed by members. The committee has made an increase in the appropriation of $40,000 for seed, which doubles the quota of each member. Nine-tenths of the gentlemen who signed that petition neither read it nor could they say they knew anything about it except they thought it was for an increase of seed. So far as I have been able to ascertain, no demand exists among our constituents for an increased number of the farmers' bulletin. If any member upon this floor has ever received a request for a farmers' bulletin which he could not supply from his own quota or from the Secretary of Agriculture, I would like that gentleman to rise and say so.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will say to the gentleman I have had a number of requests that I have not been able to fill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did not you send your bulletins out on request, or regardless of requests and generally? Have you received requests for bulletins that you have been unable to supply out of your own quota or get from the Department?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have a number that I have not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, I wish you would give me the number of the farmers' bulletins that you want, and I will undertake to say that the Secretary of Agriculture will send them out to the party who makes the request.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Here are something like a hundred of these requests for farmers' bulletins in my district. There are several who are able to read, and they would be glad to read one or read the entire hundred if they could get them. We only ask for $20,000 for the publication of these bulletins, and it is a mere drop in the bucket. When you come here with propositions affecting the commercial interests of the country, or the manufacturing interests of the country, you come here asking for commissions and appropriations couched in the hundreds of thousands or the millions and they get it, but when the farmers ask for a few thousand dollars they can not get it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am as much a farmer as the gentleman. Nearly every dollar I own in this world is invested in farming lands. I am totally dependent upon that; and so anything addressed to the farmer's interest would be as apt to meet my ear as that of anybody else. The practical point is, Do we need the bulletins for the purpose for which they are being published? Now, the gentleman says that perhaps every farmer in his district that can read would like a copy of each of the bulletins published by the Government. Where is that going to lead us? There are not only a hundred but there are more than three hundred bulletins published and to be published each year.

Now, there are 35,000 registered Democratic voters in my district, and I am said to have a district which has comparatively few voters. Are you going to multiply the number of these bulletins, 35,000, multiplied by 200, so as to give each one of the voters a specimen of each of the farmers' bulletins published by the Government of the United States? If so, that would be 7,000,000 bulletins to each Congressional district. If you are not going to do that, where are you going to draw the line? The proper place is the line of the demand and supply of bulletins; and I say advisedly, after a service of eight years on the committee, that the demand for bulletins does meet the supply of them. I for one have never received a request I have not complied with by taking it out of my own quota or dropping a note to the Secretary of Agriculture, who has acknowledged the receipt and said, "We have sent Mr. Smith, at your request, Bulletin No. so-and-so."

Mr. MADDOX. Is it not a fact that there are two or three important bulletins that are out of print?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. There are.

Mr. MADDOX. My experience concurs with that of the gentleman from Mississippi, except in one or two instances where I have been obliged to inform them that these important bulletins are out of print.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; and I am glad the gentleman from Georgia called this up. I want to say that the Secretary of Agriculture has the power under the general law, which has been a law for a long while, to republish bulletins which have been exhausted, provided the republication does not cost over a certain amount of money; I have forgotten what that amount is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it is a thousand dollars.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; I think it is a thousand dollars for any one bulletin. We can always call upon the Secretary of Agriculture to republish a given bulletin if it comes within the appropriation. Congress can do this regardless of limit of cost.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Mississippi means a thousand copies.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; I mean a thousand dollars. The bulletins do not cost over 5 or 6 cents apiece.

Mr. MADDOX. I have several times had occasion to say to my constituents that such a bulletin was exhausted, but as a rule they are all furnished that are called for.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I have been obliged to say on several occasions that a certain bulletin was exhausted, but afterwards I have been able to get it.

Mr. LATIMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One further remark and I will yield to the gentleman. Now, Mr. Chairman, to show how important it is to legislate with a full knowledge by the committee investigating the matter in hand, and knowing what they are doing, I want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] offers an amendment to change the word "June," in line 1, page 26, to the word "March," under the impression that members of Congress are thereby assisted. He is so far from being right in that respect that he is exactly wrong. The law reads this way:

Provided further, That all such bulletins included in the quota of Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, not called for on or before the 30th day of June in each fiscal year shall revert to the Secretary of Agriculture.

So now he wants to change the word "June" to "March," so that if we do not get them out by the last of March they shall revert to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. LATIMER. What does the Secretary do with them?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No matter what he does with them. He will generally give them to your or my constituents or send them to people on our request; but if we keep them we can do that without the necessity of making a request. As far as I am concerned, my bulletins have not yet been sent out fully, and I do not want to be compelled to send them as early as March.

Mr. LATIMER. The gentleman desires to be fair——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly I do.

Mr. LATIMER. Will he look at the bottom of page 25 and see that it provides if they are not "called for" they shall revert; but can you not write a line to the Secretary saying that you reserve them?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; but practically the way we call for them is by addressing our franks and sending then to the Department, which sends them out. I do not want to have to write there and say, "Send up my bulletins to my house" or "my city address," and have them cumber up my room or my library. I want them to remain in the Department without useless cost to the Government until the 1st of July, and when I find out what are the important bulletins and who wants them, and what are the interesting portions of the literature published, have them sent out by the Department. I want to take my own time in distributing the bulletins, and in distributing precisely the bulletins that my constituents want. I do not want to be limited to the 30th of March, I want until the 30th of June.

Mr. LATIMER. Why can not you notify Mr. Hill, who has charge of the bulletins, that you reserve your quota of bulletins and then serve notice on him, if you want them sent, when you get ready? The point I want to make is this, and the reason I offer my amendment is, that if you wait until the 30th day of June before the bulletins revert to the Secretary, the most of the members have gone home and it is too late to send them out for that session of Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But they can go out under your direction after members of Congress have gone home.

Mr. LATIMER. Well, in March we are here to look after them, and a great many revert to the Secretary, and June is too late for the members to get them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not too late. I have been in Washington more Junes during the off years than I have been at home; but suppose you are at home, you do not cease distributing literature while at home. We make up our franks and send them to the Department, and the Department sends out literature with the franks just as much and just as well as if we are here.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that the gentleman be allowed to continue for five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Mississippi will allow me to say that he does not seem to understand as I do the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina. I talked with the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture about this matter, and he stated that there were some members from the cities who do not dispose of or call for their quota of seeds and bulletins within the time required by law, and meanwhile the Department can not supply them to anyone else. He made the suggestion to me that if members were required, both as to seeds and bulletins, to notify the Department more promptly as to what they wished to have done with these articles, and if it were provided that in default of such notification within a limited time the articles would be forfeited, to be distributed by the Department, this business would be facilitated. This is the suggestion of the Department itself, not of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, of course I understand why the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture would desire to have our bulletins revert to the Department several months earlier than they now do. Of course I understand that it is in the nature of every Department of the Government, as it is in the nature of a court, to grow in its jurisdiction, to try to increase its control over matters and things. I understand, therefore, why the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture should desire that my bulletins and yours should be forfeited to the Department several months earlier than they are now forfeited. But I understand, also, that what we desire, in the interests of our constituents, is that we should keep control of these bulletins as long as may be.

Mr. SIMS. Why should not members send notice to the Department in good time if they do not require their seeds or documents?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That does not make any difference; I can not keep up with these "notices," nor can other members; we are too busy.

One word about the people who read these bulletins. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] comes from a cotton district; so does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]; so do I. Now, in March the people in my part of the country are not reading farmers' bulletins; they are at work and very hard at work. It is when they have laid by their crop in the summer time and before cotton picking begins that the people do most of their agricultural reading. I would rather send my farmers' bulletins to my constituents in July and August than in March, April, or May, if I want them to be read.

Now, I want to make one other observation, in conclusion; and this is an important question in connection with the Department of Agriculture. There is not a single division or bureau of that Department upon which we could not expend advantageously $1,000,000 each year. Take the Chemical Division, the Agrostological Division, the Publication Division, the Entomological Division, the Biological Division, the Weather Bureau, the Bureau of Animal Industry—there is not one of those upon which a million dollars a year might not be advantageously expended in forwarding the work of that particular division in such a way as to prove of immense advantage to the people and the world. But we must have some thought of symmetry and proportion in the expenditures of the Department.

If we undertook to do all that could be done by any one bureau or division of the Agricultural Department consistently with the good of the farming community in one year, we could take every dollar appropriated for the entire Agricultural Department and give it to that bureau or division alone, and we could with sufficient employment of force expend every dollar of it advantageously. But we must do our work, especially in scientific matters, slowly and gradually. We must put a certain amount of money at the behest of each bureau and keep it engaged on a given subject until it gets through with it, when it can be laid aside and some other subject taken up. We have a long time in which to complete these various branches of work. So that when I take the position that we should not at a given time grant an enlarged appropriation for a particular bureau, I do not ignore the fact that an additional appropriation would perhaps result in some good.

We have in this bill increased the appropriations for agriculture alone a third of a million dollars. Since I have been on this committee we have increased the aggregate of this bill every year to a very large extent. We are trying to do the very best we can. The problem is how to be liberal and at the same time to be wise in the expenditure of money.

I yield a moment to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER].

Mr. LATIMER. I want to say a word on this question, and I want the House to hear what I say. The Secretary of Agriculture has been quoted here as to the number of these bulletins that we must print.

The Secretary of Agriculture recommended an appropriation of $8,000 for the use of the Division of Agrostology. You ignored his request and reported only $5,000. Now, the Secretary says that it would be a good idea to allow the bulletins to lapse on the 31st of March, and you say he would like it, but that you do not like the suggestion, and therefore you ignore him. You ignore him, in other words, when it does not suit you to adopt his suggestion; and when the suggestion pleases you, then you fall in with him and make the appropriations accordingly.

Now, I wish to say that this is a question——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can yield to the gentleman for a speech.

Mr. LATIMER. Just a word in this connection.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; let me answer the gentleman first. I have but a few moments remaining.

The gentleman from South Carolina says that on some subjects we join with the Secretary of Agriculture and on some others we ignore him. I plead guilty to that suggestion, and plead guilty to the fact that I stand in accord with nearly every man I ever knew in all my life on some things, but not on all things. Why, my friend joined me only last week or the week before in standing by the President in favor of free trade between Puerto Rico and other parts of the United States. [Laughter.] And yet I dare say that neither of us would stand by the President in many other things which he would recommend.

Now, when we reach the Division of Agrostology, the gentleman quotes the Secretary of Agriculture as asking for a larger appropriation; but when we reach the provision relating to the publication and distribution of these bulletins, there is quite a difference. In other words, you quote him for what he is worth on that question and I on this. The Secretary has asked for what we have given him for publication of bulletins, and we have granted him what he asked—nothing more and nothing less.

Mr. LATIMER. What I tried to say before, but the gentleman from Mississippi refused to allow me, was with reference to what the Secretary did request. The Secretary said that it was a question for the House and not for himself. It is for the House to determine the question as to these bulletins. It is for the House to determine how many bulletins may be printed. It is a question that affects each member of the House individually. The bulletins are allotted to us, and the extra appropriation asked for is to give each member a double quota instead of what he now gets.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, I do not consider that these publications or distributions of any kind should affect members other than in a legitimate way. The object is not a personal one to the member. The object is to furnish information for the farmers as far and as fully as it is possible to do. Now, if the gentleman means to say that the use of these bulletins affects each member of the House in order to enable him to retain his seat in Congress or to secure his renomination or election to Congress, I scorn the use of the argument in that behalf. I do not think that gentlemen have the right to spend the public money with a view to their renomination or reelection. Public money expended in any one of the several Departments of the Government ought to rest solely upon the argument of the public good. I do not believe that it is the wish of any gentleman on this floor who deserves membership in this body to appropriate the public moneys to help himself, or for any purpose save the public good and in answer to a useful and beneficent demand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'GRADY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the Agricultural appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 292. An act granting an increase of pension to Martha G. D. Lyster—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented a memorial of the Central Trades and Labor Council of Rochester, N. Y., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation regulating electrical wiring in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Groton, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation requiring the labeling of oleomargarine and all kindred dairy products; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of Sydney Post, No. 41, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, of Ithaca, N. Y., praying for the adoption of a certain amendment to Senate bill No. 1477, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Real Estate Board of Brokers of New York City, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the reduction of stamp-tax duties imposed on mortgages, leases, rent receipts, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Cuba, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Perry, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Syracuse, and of the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Wolcott, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I present a petition of sundry citizens of Vale Summit, Md., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1770, to provide for the acquisition, purchase, construction, and condemnation by the United States of America of all railroads lying in the Territories of the United States, the respective States, and the District of Columbia engaged in interstate commerce in carrying the mails and to provide for the said roads of the United States, and amending the act of Congress of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes." I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Petition for public ownership of railways, telegraphs, and telephones and for passage of bill No. S. 1770 and against bill No. S. 1439.

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the Constitution has reposed in Congress power to regulate interstate commerce and provide for the carriage of the mails, both of which are long likely to be carried by railroads, which are public highways, and their administration of function of government; and

Whereas it is the constitutional right of your petitioners that the foregoing function of government be administered equally and justly to all citizens, that they be not denied the equal protection of the laws; and

Whereas experience has demonstrated the futility of more regulation to obtain such just and equal treatment from private corporations while they possess the active powers of government inherent in the ownership of such railways, now, in fact, irresponsible monopolies; but, on the contrary, unjust tolls have long been exacted from many persons and localities, and secret and unjust preferences granted to favored persons and corporations whereby trusts and monopolies have been created and are still sustained to the great injury of innocent persons and the demoralization of the business community, and all this in open defiance of law and the equal principles of our Government, and in the very teeth of both State and Federal regulation, which are powerless to protect the people; and

Whereas such railway monopolies and other consequent trusts tend to corrupt the public conscience, forestall commerce between the States, destroy competition, and confiscate the property of innocent persons by their discriminations and favors; which conditions render it necessary that the Government should acquire the said highways and operate the same as one of its own functions, to secure for its citizens the equal protection of the laws and those equal opportunities to insure which government is ordained, some forty out of fifty nations of the world now operating directly their respective railways free from the great evils of our private system; and

Whereas it is certain that the unification of the railways of this country under Government ownership and operation would secure for the people:

First. The stability of the capital now invested in railways at its just worth.

Second. Its ultimate payment and retirement, and the elimination, thus of one-third of the burdens of commerce, etc.

Third. Absolutely equal treatment to the patrons of the railways.

Fourth. An eight-hour work day for railway employees.

Fifth. A cent a mile passenger fare for the entire country, and penny postage.

Sixth. A better development of the resources of the country, and a just distribution of railway mileage.

Seventh. The establishment of postal express at one-half of present cost.

Eighth. A system of accident insurance for passengers, employees, and shippers.

Ninth. The prevention of strikes and many monopolies, trusts, etc.

Tenth. The emancipation of public men, primaries, and elections from the growing evils of railway politics, and the security of railway employees by a rigid system of merit, tenure, etc.

Therefore, the undersigned, citizens of Vale Summit, Maryland State, respectfully remonstrate against the passage of Senate bill No. 1439, as a further experiment of "regulation," but in fact an act to legalize railway trusts, and do petition Congress to at once enact legislation for Government ownership and operation of railways, as well as telegraphs and telephones, and to acquire the same at a fair valuation by purchase or condemnation, to the end that equality of opportunity in the use of transportation may be guaranteed to all citizens of the Republic; and we recommend for immediate consideration the pending bill S. 1770, introduced in the Senate by the Hon. Senator RICHARD F. PETTIGREW.

Mr. PETTIGREW presented a petition of sundry citizens of Hoffman, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the Government ownership and operation of railways, as well as telegraphs and telephones, and to acquire the same at a fair valuation by purchase or condemnation, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Lempster, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the selling of or dealing in beer, wine, or any intoxicating drinks in any post exchange, or canteens, or transports, or upon any premises used for military purposes by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented memorials of the Soldiers and Sailors' Department of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dayton, Ohio, remonstrating against the sale of intoxicating liquors in the newly acquired possessions and in the Army; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Rev. Edwin Sherwood, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and A. L. Ellis, trustee, of Kingston, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in canteens at Army and Naval Soldiers' Homes, immigrant stations, and Government buildings, and on all grounds and premises used by the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, of Delaware, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in canteens and on all Government property; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Mountville Grange, No. 1403, Patrons of Husbandry, of Mountville, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to secure protection in the use of adulterated food products; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the First Presbyterian Church of Metuchen, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Army and also in our new island possessions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Daretown, N. J., and a petition of the Christian Endeavor Society of Daretown, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all Government buildings and premises; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HOAR presented the memorial of Rev. Joseph H. Johnson, of Los Angeles, Cal., bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, remonstrating against the extension of sovereignty over foreign territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

He also presented the memorial of Rev. Edward Everett Hale and sundry other citizens of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation extending the time for transportation of live stock from one State to another; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Natick, Mass., and a memorial of the Woman's Suffrage League of Natick, Mass., remonstrating against the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army canteens; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented resolutions of the legislature of Massachusetts, favoring the enactment of legislation for the establishment of a harbor of refuge upon the eastern shore of Cape Cod; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Woman's Suffrage League of Natick, Mass., and a memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Natick, Mass., remonstrating against the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors in Hawaii; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Joseph J. Corbett, chairman, and James J. Mr. DAVIS (by request) submitted an amendment providing that members of the District militia and notaries public in and for the District of Columbia, not otherwise in Government employ, shall not be debarred from practicing before the Executive Departments or the Court of Claims, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GEAR submitted an amendment relative to the hours of labor of clerks and employees in post-offices of the first and second class below the grade of chief clerk, intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CAROLINE L. GUILD.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Senate bill No. 4612, second session, Fifty-fifth Congress, granting a pension to Caroline L. Guild, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there being no adverse report thereon.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP OF RAILROADS.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 3,000 copies each of Senate bill No. 1770 and Senate Document No. 53, this Congress.

DEMANDS UPON CHINA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether the United States has through its representatives joined with any other nation in making demands upon China; and, if so, what is the nature of the demands.

The President is also requested to inform the Senate whether any threat accompany the demands as a penalty for noncompliance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. Let that go over.

Mr. HALE. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over under the rule.

INVESTIGATION OF FOOD SUPPLIES FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there shall be printed for the use of Congress the usual number of copies of the "record of the court of inquiry, convened February 20, 1899, in accordance with the instructions of the President of February 3, 1899, to investigate certain allegations of the Major-General Commanding the Army in respect to the unfitness for issue of certain articles of food furnished by the Subsistence Department to the troops in the field during the recent operations in Cuba and Porto Rico;" and that when the same is printed that the original record shall be returned to the War Department for file.

EXPENDITURES FOR PARIS EXPOSITION.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I submit a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the Senate for its information the "detailed statement of expenditures of the Commissioner-General of the United States to the Paris Exposition of 1900," as provided for under the act of 1898, creating the office of "Commissioner-General to the Paris Exposition, and for other purposes."

Resolved further, That said detailed statement should, in the opinion of the Senate, state the number and names, places of residence, and salary paid to experts, clerks, officers, and employees, and should in like manner set out the details of other expenditures.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, the law requires that there shall be a detailed statement made by the Commissioner-General of the United States to the Paris Exposition. A day or two ago the President sent the following message to the Senate:

I transmit herewith a copy of a letter from Mr. Ferdinand W. Peck, Commissioner-General of the United States to the Paris Exposition of 1900, dated November 17, 1899, submitting a detailed statement of the expenditures incurred under authority of law.

The letter accompanying the message of the President has no statement whatever in the body of the letter about expenditures. There is appended to it, however, a "statement of expenditures made from appropriation for Paris Exposition of 1900 from November 15, 1898, to November 1, 1899, as submitted by Frederick Brackett, secretary and disbursing officer," which is as follows:

Salaries of experts	$72,045.14
Salaries of clerks	34,929.11
Officers' salaries	17,765.08
Salaries of employees	2,732.27
Traveling expenses	26,245.15
Buildings	98,647.91
Rent, Chicago, Paris, and New York	13,490.95
Furniture	7,252.69
Stationery and printing	5,493.75
Telegraph and cable	1,775.00
Miscellaneous	10,400.46
Total	240,633.51

Here is a total expenditure of $240,633.51, summed up in less than a dozen items, such as "salaries of experts, $72,000." It seems to me that this statement submitted by Mr. Frederick Brackett does not comply with the law, which requires that Mr. Peck shall make a detailed statement of his expenditures to Congress, which shall be transmitted through the President to Congress.

The resolution which I have presented asks the President to have such a detailed statement presented. If Mr. Peck has made such a report to the President and it has been overlooked, of course it will be forwarded by the Executive. If he has not made such a detailed statement, then, in my opinion, it is his duty to do so, and when his attention is called to it by the President he will doubtless make it.

The resolution was agreed to.

READJUSTED SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. BACON submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to report upon a schedule to the Senate the readjusted salaries of all postmasters who served in the State of Georgia between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, whose names as claimants appear in the Court of Claims in the case entitled "John T. Paxson and others vs. The United States," No. 18194. Each such stated account to conform in all respects to the order of the Postmaster-General published by circular under date of June 9, 1883, and to the requirement of the act of March 3, 1883, as said requirement was published by the Postmaster-General in the newspapers of the country under date of February 17, 1884, and with such report transmit to the Senate a full copy of the text of the construction by the Postmaster-General of the act of March 3, 1883, embodied in the said circular and publications in the newspapers and in circular form No. 1223, the text of each of which, under date of November 8, 1897, was transmitted by the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General for use in the case of Jane Yarrington and others vs. The United States, No. 1645.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6959) to extend the provisions of an act entitled "An act granting increase of pension to soldiers of the Mexican war in certain cases," approved January 5, 1893, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent to call up Order of Business 679, House bill 445.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed. The Senator from Nebraska will allow the Chair to lay before the Senate, under the unanimous agreement, the following resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska was recognized.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the resolution be disposed of without further debate two weeks from to-day at 4 o'clock.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I trust there will be no objection to the request, and that the Senate will agree to vote upon the resolution at that time.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that it may be disposed of in two weeks without further debate?

Mr. CHANDLER. Without debate after that time.

Mr. ALLEN. But it will be debatable up to that time?

Mr. CHANDLER. The resolution will be debatable up to that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire will state exactly his request.

Mr. CHANDLER. I avoided any question as to what motions will be in order by asking that there shall be unanimous consent that two weeks from to-day, at 4 o'clock, the resolution shall be disposed of without debate after that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the pending resolution shall be disposed of without debate at 4 o'clock two weeks from to-day.

Mr. HALE. That does not cut off subsidiary motions.

Mr. PETTUS. Without debate after 4 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without debate after 4 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. That does not cut off subsidiary motions?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have made the request in intelligible language, and I am willing to modify it to suit any one who can suggest better. The object was not to exclude any kind of motion——

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. Any Senator chooses to make at that time, but that debate shall cease and the resolution shall then be voted on and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PENROSE. I understood the Senator from Alabama to make some suggestion as to the phrase "without debate after 4 o'clock."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; he merely suggested that the agreement would not prevent debate up to 4 o'clock. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think there will be any difficulty in this case, but where a day is fixed for the disposition of a subject of this kind any Senator who chooses to debate it prior to the time of voting ought to have the right to do so, and he ought to have the right to the exclusion of everything else between now and the time fixed for the vote. I suppose there will be no difficulty about that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suppose the continuous-consideration agreement still continues, so that any Senator who wants to speak before that time would have preference over all other matters.

Mr. HALE. A Senator can speak at any time between now and then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is continuously in order. The exceptions made in the unanimous-consent request were appropriation bills, the Porto Rican bill, conference reports, and the bill reported from the Committee on the Philippines by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I take it for granted that an opportunity will be given to debate this question and that even an appropriation bill should give way when a Senator wishes to make a speech on this resolution after the time for taking the vote has been agreed upon.

Mr. CHANDLER. Undoubtedly; there will be no difficulty about that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not think there will be, but still it is better to have these things understood and to have the matter made plain.

Mr. CHANDLER. We are expecting to hear from the Senator from Michigan immediately.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not expect to say anything about it, and I only submit that those Senators who desire to do so should have the right to be heard as against anything that comes up between now and the time agreed upon to take the vote.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] was recognized.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] having given notice that he will speak to-morrow on this resolution, if no other Senator desires to speak at this time, I will ask that the resolution may go over until after the routine business to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I understand the unanimous-consent agreement has been announced by the Chair as agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire whether any motion to amend the resolution has yet been made?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to amend has been made and is pending.

Mr. HOAR. To strike out the word "not?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to strike out the word "not."

Mr. CULLOM. With the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, I will call up the bill that is on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to debate the Quay resolution at this moment for about three minutes.

Mr. CULLOM. Let me have a conference committee appointed, and then I will get out of the way.

Mr. HOAR. All right.

GOVERNMENT FOR HAWAII.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I see that the House have passed a substitute for the Senate Hawaiian bill and that on page 8 of the House bill, section 10, they provide "that all obligations, contracts, rights of action, suits at law and in equity," etc., "shall continue to be as effectual as if this act had not been passed." This would allow the enforcement of all existing civil contracts. Contract or slave labor is held by the courts of Hawaii to be a civil contract, and under the Hawaiian law they enforce all contracts by imprisonment and can go to the extent of imprisonment for life. I trust the conferees will see that this provision is so amended as to prevent the enforcement of the existing slave-labor contracts of that island.

The House have adopted the provision that all contracts made since August 12, 1898, are declared null and void and shall terminate, but section 10 also provides:

That no suit or proceedings shall be maintained for the specific performance of any contract heretofore or hereafter entered into for personal labor or service, nor shall any remedy exist or be enforced for breach of any such contract, except in a civil suit or proceeding instituted solely to recover damages for such breach.

Inasmuch as the courts have held that these contracts are civil contracts, I do not know but that there are laws existing in Hawaii that we perpetuate (for we perpetuate a large body of their laws) which provide that damages for a breach of one of these contracts may be collected, and that prior to their collection the person against whom the recovery was secured could be imprisoned. Perhaps their laws so provide. If they do, then until we repeal those contract-labor laws and provide that a suit for damages for the breach of these contracts may be had, these men might still be held for service and compelled to work out the damages upon the plantations under the whip and lash of the slave master. I hope the conferees will carefully guard that provision and see that there is no question about it.

The House bill also provides that the provisions of this section 10 shall not apply to merchant seamen. In other words, it indirectly provides that the existing laws with regard to merchant seamen may be enforced. The existing law of Hawaii makes a seaman a slave during the term of his contract. If he is engaged in foreign service, that is the law of the United States. But in 1898 we passed a law by which a seaman engaged in the domestic trade of the United States could not be compelled to carry out the provisions of his contract or be imprisoned if he failed to do so. I hope the conferees will see that this provision is modified so that at least the laws of the United States with regard to seamen, so far as they apply to our domestic trade, shall apply to seamen engaged in the trade with Hawaii.

I am particularly anxious about this for the reason that on page 50 of the bill the House have provided—

At the expiration of one year after the passage and approval of this act the coasting trade between the islands aforesaid and any other portion of the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great coasting districts.

We put off the time when the coasting laws of the United States shall apply for one year, and I hope this provision will be stricken out entirely. It seems to me that the provision in relation to our coasting trade should apply at once, and I can see no good reason why this provision should be continued.

I find also, on page 26 of the House bill, that there is the following provision:

Prior to each regular election, during the time prescribed by law for registration, have caused his name to be entered on the register of voters for representatives for his district.

I do not know what the Hawaiian law is with regard to registration, but if a law should be so constituted, or if the last legislature should have enacted a law by which no persons could vote at the next election unless they were registered previous to the passage of this bill, which would shut out all the people except the sugar planters of that country, upon whom especially the right of suffrage is conferred, this provision ought to be modified so that any person who is registered previous to the next election, or if not registered can qualify by affidavit, shall be allowed to vote, and that there may be no question upon that score.

We continue the election laws, generally, of Hawaii. I have not examined them, but I think, with the modifications made in this bill, they are reasonably fair, with the correction with regard to registration.

I see the House has also provided that the Federal court appointment shall be for life. It seems to me that provision ought not to be agreed to on the part of the Senate. After a long debate, I believe we changed that provision in the Senate, and insisted that it should be a term, and that the judge could be removed by the President.

I simply wish to call the attention of the conferees to these points in the record, as I think the Senate ought to insist upon them.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to say anything now. I ask for a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate nonconcur in the amendment of the House of Representatives and request a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. MORGAN were appointed.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to call attention to the form in which this bill is printed. The original bill is not printed.

Mr. TELLER. It is omitted.

Mr. ALLISON. It is omitted. I think on the record this copy is attached to the original bill.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill as it passed the Senate is in print, and there will be no difficulty in the matter on the part of the conferees.

Mr. ALLISON. Is that the original bill on the Senator's desk?

Mr. CULLOM. This is the original bill, and here is the print which I got from the House before it was printed here.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois if the bill is in print exactly as it passed the Senate?

Mr. CULLOM. It is, exactly as it passed the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then there should be a reprint of it, together with the House print.

Mr. ALLISON. That should be done. There should be a reprint of the original bill with the amendment of the House.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that we may have a reprint of the bill as it passed the Senate, together with the House amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota asks that there be a reprint of the Senate bill with the House amendment attached.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say in justification——

Mr. TELLER. It has always been the custom, so far as I recollect, to have bills printed in that way. I do not understand this new arrangement. We have not the Senate bill here at all now. The amendment should have been printed with a copy of the bill showing what was stricken out and what was substituted by the House. That is the proper way to keep the record. I want to protest against this method of sending bills to us. I do not know whose fault it is.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to say that the proper officer of the Senate came to me with the bill as it passed the House and asked me whether both bills should be printed, and it occurred to me at the time that as we had plenty of copies of the original bill as it passed the Senate it might not be necessary to reprint it, and I told him I thought that would not be necessary. So if there was any fault about it on the part of the Senate it was mine. I want to justify the action of the clerk.

Mr. TELLER. It is not a very serious fault, but I do not want to depart from the usual custom of sending bills here that has been in vogue ever since I have been in the Senate, because that is the convenient way.

Mr. CULLOM. I presume the Senator means to criticise what was done by the House, and not what was done by the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whom it is a criticism of, and I do not care. What I want to insist upon is that when a bill goes to the House from this body and is acted upon there, and a substitute bill has been passed by the House, the Senate text and the House text shall come here together as one bill.

Mr. ALLISON. And be printed.

Mr. TELLER. And be printed. That has been the custom.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think it came in that way.

Mr. TELLER. Lines should be drawn through the Senate bill showing that the House had stricken it out, and then let the House bill be printed following it. That is the way the bill should come, so that we may compare the bill of the Senate with the substitute passed by the House.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he rose with reference to the pending election case?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; I have been upon the floor for some time on another matter.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to address the Senate on the Quay election case, which I understand is now up, and I think I shall occupy not more than two minutes.

Mr. ALLEN. I have had recognition here for nearly half an hour, but have yielded to other matters.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator will allow me a few moments.

Mr. ALLEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. TURLEY, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 23, 1900:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, among the arguments which have been presented to the Senate with a good deal of earnestness in opposition to the construction of the Constitution which makes it the duty of the governor of a State to appoint a Senator whenever there is a vacancy and the legislature is not in session has been the argument that there is likely to be intrigue on the part of the executive of the State to prevent a choice in order that he himself may exercise this power, which is supposed to be a desirable one.

It never has seemed to me that there was very great practical force in that argument, or that it was a contingency which the framers of the Constitution would ever have dreamed of; but it has made an impression on so many able and intelligent Senators that I have no doubt I am wrong in underestimating its force. I wish to point out to the Senate that the force of the motive to prevent an election, in order that it may go over to another year, when it is hoped that there may be a change of political parties, is a much stronger one than the one which may operate upon the governor, and it is a motive which would be likely to affect members of the legislature itself.

I wish to introduce into this discussion a chapter of the history of the State of Indiana, where the election of a Senator was put over three times in the expectation that by defeating an election by a majority the other party would get a majority twelve months later, and would then elect its own Senator; and I think in the third instance the object was accomplished.

Mr. President, the history of this transaction is very well stated in the Tribune Almanac of 1859, occupying a little more than two pages; and if I may be permitted to have that history printed as part of my remarks in the RECORD, I can save the time of the Senate and not read it. I therefore ask that this may be printed as part of my remarks as if I had read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOW THEY ELECT BOGUS UNITED STATES SENATORS IN INDIANA.

In 1845, fourteen years ago, it became the duty of the Indiana legislature to elect a United States Senator. The house was Whig by 10 majority, the senate a tie, and Jesse D. Bright, as lieutenant-governor, presided over it. Although the house repeatedly invited the senate to meet them in joint convention to elect a Senator, every one of their resolutions was lost in the senate by the casting vote of Mr. Bright, its president. The election was thus staved off for the session; the next legislature was "Democratic," and Mr. Bright received the vacant Senatorship as his reward.

In 1855 another Senator was to be elected. In the senate, in consequence of half of its members being hold-overs, there was 2 Democratic majority; but in the house there were 16 anti-Nebraska majority, making 14 Republican majority on joint ballot. The house sent resolution after resolution to the senate for joint convention to elect a Senator and the numerous State officers which the constitution and the laws required to be filled by that session of the legislature. But the senate, by a party vote, steadily refused to join the house, leaving the Senatorial seat vacant and the entire patronage of the State in the hands of the Democratic governor.

Two years passed by and in 1856 Indiana elected her next legislature—a majority on joint ballot, under the issue of "Buchanan and fair play for Kansas," being Democratic. But, as it happened, while the house had a Democratic majority, the senate now, by the change in the former hold-overs, had an opposition majority of 4. In giving a narrative of what subsequently occurred it should be borne in mind that the Republicans were willing, from the first to the last, that both Senators (to fill the vacancy and for Mr. Bright's full term) should be chosen by a concurrent vote of each house, acting separately, and they demanded as their right only the Senator for the vacancy which they had fairly won by the 12,000 anti-Nebraska majority of the people and 14 majority in the legislature at the previous election, and which they had been deliberately cheated out of by their opponents.

The constitution of Indiana requires that the votes for governor and lieutenant governor shall be counted in the presence of both houses of the legislature, and the Democracy determined to use this to trap their opponents into a joint convention, which, as no law for electing Senators exists in Indiana, should immediately after the counting elect two gentlemen to that office. The Republicans insisted that, in the absence of law, the Constitution of the United States was the only guide in the matter. That instrument declares that Senators shall be elected by "the legislature;" and the constitution of Indiana defines the legislature to be the senate and the house, and requires all acts of legislation by them to be assented to by a majority of the entire membership of each, acting separately.

From the official report and the official copies of the journals of both branches of the legislature appended to Senate Report No. 275 (volume 2, Reports U. S. Senate, 1857-58), we find the following facts:

On the 12th of January, 1857, the house sent to the senate a resolution inviting them to be present in their hall at half past 2 p. m. "to open and publish the returns of the election."

The Republican senators offered to concur, with a proviso that as soon as the counting and swearing in was over the joint meeting should be adjourned sine die. But while this was pending, and before any vote was taken on the invitation of the house, and thirty-five minutes before the time designated in the resolution, Lieutenant-Governor Willard, who was presiding and who was also the governor-elect, vacated his seat, and, followed by a minority of the senate, repaired to the representative hall, leaving the senate still in session. Arrived there, this sham joint convention opened, the speaker of the house in the chair. After counting the votes, one of the Democratic senators was, without any motion or any vote, called upon to preside. He took his seat and, without any proposition from any member whatever or any vote being taken, adjourned the joint convention till Monday, the 2d of February, without stating any reason or pretext for its reassembling.

It becoming evident that a fraudulent election of Senators was about to be attempted (all persuasions to seduce the majority of the senate into a joint convention having failed), the senate, on the 29th of January, four days before the time at which the unauthorized convention was to meet, adopted a solemn protest against it by a vote, by ayes and noes, of 27 to 20, declaring that they had given no assent to any joint convention for any purpose whatever; that any pretended assemblage of that sort would be illegal and fraudulent, and branding in advance any attempt to thus elect Senators as insulting to the senate and disgraceful to the State.

This formal and solemn protest, thus adopted by 27 out of the 50 State senators, staggered the conspirators; and when the 2d of February arrived, although the new lieutenant-governor, with a minority of the senate, again repaired to the representative hall, leaving the senate still in session and going on with their business, nothing whatever was done or attempted; but the presiding officer, without any motion or any vote, and without stating any object whatever, declared the joint convention again adjourned till the following Wednesday.

On Wednesday, the 4th of February, the pretended joint convention again assembled—and it should be borne in mind that the affidavits of the secretaries of the senate set forth the fact that the senate was never even invited by the House to meet them in joint convention for the purpose of electing Senators from the first day of the session to the last—when, without any motion or resolution by any member of this illegal assemblage, the lieutenant-governor instructed them "to proceed to choose United States Senators by a viva voce vote." Whereupon 23 senators (out of 50) voted for Bright and Fitch, one senator, who was present looking on, refused to vote; 60 out of the 100 representatives (it requires by the State constitution two-thirds of the whole number of members to make a quorum for transacting business in either branch) voted for the same candidates, and two other representatives voted for George G. Dunn and R. W. Thompson.

The lieutenant-governor declared Bright and Fitch elected, and again, without any motion or vote, adjourned the joint convention till February 11. The intention was at that time to go on and choose the State officers whose election they had prevented two years before, but finding that the incumbents, though of their own party, would not consent, without a legal contest, to be ousted by any such bogus election, the joint convention, when the 11th of February arrived, was adjourned sine die and the patronage again left in the hands of the governor for the ensuing two years.

The senate having protested against this fraud on the 29th of January in advance of its commission, again repudiated it the day after its alleged consummation. On the 5th of February 27 senators out of the 50 signed and placed on their journals a protest, a copy of which they sent to the United States Senate, declaring that their body had not participated in the election, was in session when it pretended to have occurred, and most solemnly protesting against the recognition of this fraud.

With these papers came up also a petition to the United States Senate, signed by 27 senators and 55 representatives, remonstrating against this fraudulent election, which was not participated in by a quorum of either branch, declaring this alleged joint convention unauthorized by any law of the State, by any resolution adopted by the legislature, or by any provision of the State or National Constitution, and that to affirm it would destroy the existence of the senate of Indiana as an independent branch of the legislative department of the State. And to make their argument unanswerable, the sworn affidavit of 26 senators accompanied these protests, each of them solemnly declaring that they did not participate in this so-called joint convention, but were, at the very hour of its alleged assembling, sitting in their seats in the senate, in open session.

Thus it will be seen that this case differs from the Harlan or Iowa case most materially. In that election both branches had agreed to the joint convention, and had voted repeatedly but ineffectually for Senator; but finding at last that a Republican was about to be elected, a majority of the senate, being Democratic, absented themselves; and although Mr. Harlan had a clear majority of the whole legislature, the Democrats in the United States Senate turned him out of his seat. After this decision, the above high-handed and disgraceful outrage was carried through in Indiana in the very teeth of the Harlan decision. And the same United States Senate, after staving it off for over a year, with the usurpers meanwhile in their seats, voting Lecompton, appropriation bills, etc., ratify it at last, in the expiring hours of the last session, by 7 majority.

The sitting members at the regular session of 1857—at the extra session and again at the last regular session—insisted that they must have more testimony than the records afforded; and finally, on February 16, 1858, a resolution passed giving them ninety days to take it in, before any judge, by giving notice thereof to the protestants. But, after this long delay on this pretext, they did not give a single notice under the resolution, and the only evidence they proffered was ex parte affidavits of political friends, taken when no cross-examination was allowed.

The Republicans, however, gave notice, and proved by Governor Willard himself, by William Sheets, ex-secretary of state, and O. H. Smith, ex-United States Senator, that no joint convention to count gubernatorial votes had ever even attempted to adjourn over for the transaction of other business; and the two latter witnesses, who had known the usage in Indiana for electing United States Senators for thirty years past, testified that there never had been a precedent or a parallel for this. As one reason for retaining these Senators in their seats was that there were no contestants claiming them, the Indiana legislature now in session and fresh from the people, having passed in each branch, by decisive majorities, a resolution denouncing the pretended election as fraudulent, unconstitutional, and void, propose to elect two others, legally and regularly, and to instruct them to demand the two seats in the United States Senate, which belong to the sovereign State of Indiana, but to which that body, in spite of the above protests, saw fit to elect and install these fraudulent claimants.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to suggest to the Senator that he might add to that the record of the contest in California, lasting for about eight years, when, on each occasion, the effort was made to defeat an election for the purpose of postponing, as was the case in the contest between the Broderick and the Gwin factions, which lasted for a number of years. That was the issue before the legislature.

Mr. HOAR. Of course that was in the old times when the Senator was elected by concurrent vote of the two houses, and not by a majority on joint ballot.

Mr. STEWART. That was the case.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. For the purpose of having the record complete, I should like the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Nevada to state whether in any of those cases the governor assumed to appoint a Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that he did. I do not remember about that; I have not looked it up.

Mr. STEWART. I was residing in California at the time, and was perfectly familiar with the transaction.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The governor did not attempt to appoint.

Mr. STEWART. No; he did not attempt to appoint.

Mr. HOAR. I do not think, Mr. President, that the opinion of the then governor of California or the then governor of Indiana as to this constitutional question is of much importance in a case where so great a constitutional authority as the Senator from Connecticut has expressed his opinion.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, if no other Senator wishes to speak on this resolution, I ask that it may go over until to-morrow after the routine morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL, DELAWARE BAY.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 3639. It is only a few lines in length, and will take but a moment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3639) authorizing the establishment of a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a light and fog signal on the new breakwater, harbor of refuge, Delaware Bay, at a cost not exceeding $30,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLOTMENTS OF LANDS IN SEVERALTY.

Mr. QUARLES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 890, being Senate bill 3901. It is a measure, against which there is no objection, to provide for the allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians in one of the Wisconsin reservations. It has been recommended by the Indian Bureau and unanimously recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3901) providing for allotments of lands in severalty to the Indians of the La Pointe or Bad River Reservation in the State of Wisconsin.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARE M. ASHBY.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 445) for the relief of Clare M. Ashby, widow of W. W. Ashby, late United States consul at Colon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Clare M. Ashby, the widow of W. W. Ashby, $2,866, being the balance of one year's salary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ISAAC R. DUNKELBERGER.

Mr. SHOUP. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3383) for the relief of Isaac R. Dunkelberger.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Isaac R. Dunkelberger, late a captain, First United States Cavalry, and brevet lieutenant-colonel, United States Army, a captain of cavalry in the Army, and provides that when so appointed he shall be placed on the retired list.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALPHONSO M. POTVIN.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1710) for the relief of Alphonso M. Potvin.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Alphonso M. Potvin, late of Colon, Republic of Colombia, $11,270.85, in full payment and satisfaction of all indebtedness of the United States to him, arising from his purchase, on July 21, 1888, at public auction, of the then United States consul at Colon, of three houses located in that city belonging to the estate of Susannah Smith, who had previously died there intestate, the houses being sold to Potvin by the United States consular representative, who, being unable to protect the title in the local courts of Colombia, caused a loss to said Potvin of all moneys paid by him for the property, as well as other losses and expenses, amounting to the sum aforesaid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE BLAND.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the resolutions from the House of Representatives on the death of the late Representative BLAND may now be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 7, 1900.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended in order that suitable tribute may be paid to the high character and eminent public services of the Hon. RICHARD PARKS BLAND, late a most distinguished member of the House of Representatives of the United States from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the House, at the conclusion of these memorial exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House transmit a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased statesman, and inform the Senate of the action of this body.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the widow of the deceased.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, "If a man die, shall he live again?" has been the great question presented to our race in every age as generation after generation has come and gone. Happy is the human being whose intellect and conscience with divine faith answers this question, "I know that my Redeemer liveth." He of whom I shall speak briefly to-day could so answer.

For twenty years Mr. BLAND and myself were intimate personal and political friends. I knew him well, and shall speak of his career and character to-day without exaggeration.

There was nothing spectacular nor sensational about Mr. BLAND. He was not a political graphophone, always speaking, nor an "importunate mendicant for popular applause." He was an earnest, honest, modest man of strong intellect and profound convictions of duty. So profound were those convictions that they caused his death. I know from his own lips that his health became impaired years ago when he stood by the side of Samuel J. Randall in the House of Representatives and fought to exhaustion against the first force bill introduced in that body. I know that the immediate illness which caused his death was produced when, in feeble health, on the last night of the last Congress, he remained without sleep at his post of duty guarding the interests of his constituency in the large appropriation bills then pending.

Mr. BLAND was the father and pioneer of bimetallism in the United States and gave his life to that cause. He had studied the question in all its phases, not only in the writings of eminent financiers, but in the canyons and mining camps of the far West, where Pikes Peak towers with its snow-crowned brow above the smaller mountains like some hoary-headed monarch of the feudal ages surrounded by his grim nobility.

He was a real bimetallist, not a pretender. He believed with Daniel Webster and James G. Blaine, that gold and silver were the money of the Constitution and that Congress had no right to strike down either of the precious metals in order to increase the purchasing power of the other. He believed that never could there be more gold and silver taken from the earth than was necessary for the legitimate pursuit of business.

He was no stickler for ratio, although he preferred the old ratio of 16 to 1, because our people were accustomed to it and large expense would be put upon the Government in order to make a new ratio suitable to the silver coinage in circulation.

In 1893, when the bill was pending in the House of Representatives repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act, Mr. BLAND, as leader of the bimetallic party in the United States, offered amendments providing for the free and unlimited coinage of siver at the ratios of 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 to 1; and when these were rejected he proposed the reenactment of the provisions of the old Bland-Allison Act of 1878, which declared that not less than two nor more than four million silver dollars should be coined each month. All these propositions were defeated. It then became evident that no compromise was admissible; that the advocates of the single gold standard intended to close the mints of the United States against the coinage of silver as standard money of ultimate redemption.

Believing that bimetallism was the cause of humanity, that the welfare of the laboring masses, not only in this country, but throughout the world, was imperiled by the combine of the single gold standard, which is intended to enhance the value of incomes and to make the labor of mankind subservient to capital, Mr. BLAND declared for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, without the consent of foreign nations. He believed that this was the last chance for bimetallism in all time. He knew, and never concealed it from others, that if successful this proposition would involve financial disturbance and even panic; but he preferred what he thought would be a temporary disturbance to permanent disaster. He believed that this great Republic, made for the people and by the people, should, like France, stand for bimetallism, with all its great productive and exporting powers, because it meant liberty, the corner stone of free institutions.

Mr. President, RICHARD PARKS BLAND should have been the nominee of the Democratic party naturally and logically at the great national convention of 1896, held at Chicago. I know personally that he did not desire that nomination. I know that he, above all others, knew his precarious health, that the icy finger of Death might touch him at any moment. I know from his own lips that he dreaded the labor and responsibilities of the Presidential canvass and of the great office for which he was named. He was defeated, as all leaders of great popular movements who have borne the heat and burthen of the day and excited the bitter antagonism of opponents have always been defeated in all ages and countries when success was about to crown their efforts. Political parties are actuated not by gratitude but by the hope of success. It has always been so, and will be so to the end of time. The regicides of England who beheaded Charles I before his palace at Whitehall did not long retain the power they had grasped, but surrendered in a short time to Cromwell and his associates.

Vergniaud and the other great leaders of the Girondists, who inaugurated the French Revolution and dragged the King and Queen of France to the guillotine, followed in a few short months over the same gloomy road.

In our own political history, Henry Clay, the great leader of the old Whig party, the father of "the American system" which now dominates this country, the most magnetic orator who ever spoke in the Senate of the United States, was shoved aside in 1848 to make room for Zachary Taylor, whose political opinions were almost unknown to the convention that nominated him. William H. Seward and Charles Sumner sat by the cradle of the Republican party and defended its childhood against the vitriolic eloquence of the Southern leaders, but both were superseded in 1856 by John C. Frémont, the Pathfinder, and William H. Seward was defeated in 1860 by Abraham Lincoln, who but two years before was unknown outside the limits of his own State.

So, in 1896, RICHARD PARKS BLAND, the veteran leader of bimetallism, who had stood by its banner when others faltered and deserted, was put aside for a young and brilliant orator, who was a schoolboy when BLAND introduced and passed through the House of Representatives in 1878 the first bill providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Always has it been so. The hands that place to-day upon the pedestal of popular favor their idol will shatter that idol on the morrow. Varied is "the mind of desultory man, studious of change and pleased with novelty."

Mr. President, in his domestic and social life Mr. BLAND was the most lovable and loyal man I have ever known. His heart was in his home, and he infinitely preferred the pure steady light of domestic love to the garish glare of public life. How true and loyal he was to wife and children was shown in an incident of the preliminary canvass for the nomination at Chicago in 1896, when the bigots and fanatics and slimy demagogues assailed him because his wife was a Roman Catholic and was educating her children in that communion. His answer touched the heart of manhood throughout the world: "Yes," he said, "my wife is a Roman Catholic and I am a Protestant, and shall live and die one; but my great regret is that I am not half such a Christian as the woman who bears my name and is the mother of my children."

When he left this city he went to his modest home in the Ozark Hills of Missouri, all of the estate he had after twenty-two years' service in the National Congress, and, when death had taken from him the power of speech, his last act was to extend his hands in mute benediction above the heads of the dear ones kneeling around him.

Mr. President, his body lies in the soil of the great Commonwealth whose people loved and honored him so long, and his spirit has passed across the dark river to be greeted on the other side by the five children who went before him.

The night is gone,
And with the morn those angel faces smile
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.

Statesman, patriot, stainless gentleman, and dear friend, farewell.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Mr. President, it is a time-honored custom that amid the clash and turmoil of debate and disputation in our legislative halls a truce is called on occasions such as this in order to note with solemnity the departure of one of our number upon the vast and silent journey to Eternity. The time thus spent could not be better occupied. It affords us an opportunity to pay a tribute of affection and respect to a departed friend and colleague; at the same time it brings before the mental vision of each and all of us the insecurity and uncertainty of life, and the fact that there is no escape for mortal man from the inexorable call of Death.

The Representative in whose memory the usual proceedings of the Senate are to-day suspended was a familiar figure in this Capitol for a period of nearly a quarter of a century.

RICHARD PARKS BLAND was born in 1835 in the State of Kentucky, where he resided until he was 20 years of age, when he moved to Missouri. Thence, touched by the spirit of adventure, he went, first to California, and later to that portion of the Pacific coast which afterwards became the State of Nevada. Locating in Virginia City, Mr. BLAND entered upon the practice of the law and the development of the mineral resources of the country. In 1865 he returned to Missouri, where he practiced his profession until called by the electors of his district to represent them in the National Legislature. He was elected a member of the Forty-third Congress, and took his seat in December, 1873. With the exception of a single term, he continued to represent that district with distinguished ability from that time to the date of his death.

I made his acquaintance in the early days in the far West, and then formed of him that high opinion which time and further acquaintance only strengthened and confirmed.

In 1876 and 1877 it was my fortune to be closely associated with Mr. BLAND upon the monetary commission created by joint resolution of Congress of August 15, 1876.

The resolution creating that commission and defining its duties is as follows;

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That a commission is hereby authorized and constituted, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the Senate; three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker; and experts, not exceeding three in number, to be selected by and associated with them; with authority to determine the time and place of meeting, and to take evidence, and whose duty it shall be to inquire—

First. Into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver; the causes thereof, whether permanent or otherwise; the effects thereof upon trade, commerce, finance, and the productive interests of the country, and upon the standard (of) value in this and foreign countries;

Second. Into the policy of the restoration of the double standard in this country; and, if restored, what the legal relation between the two coins, silver and gold, should be;

Third. Into the policy of continuing legal-tender notes concurrently with the metallic standards, and the effects thereof upon the labor, industries, and wealth of the country; and Fourth. Into the best means for providing for facilitating the resumption of specie payments.

In the course of the proceedings of that commission its members had ample opportunity to observe the earnestness, zeal, and ability displayed by Mr. BLAND and the warm interest which he took in the important inquiry that had been committed to the charge of the commission.

This is not an occasion, Mr. President, for the discussion of the merits of great controverted questions, but the work done by our colleague who is no longer with us, and the noble motive which inspired his conduct, can not be understood without the statement that in the remonetization of silver Mr. BLAND perceived the only effective means of arresting the ruinous fall of prices that for so many years had depressed the business conditions of the United States and had relegated to idleness large numbers of his fellow-countrymen.

With the insight of a statesman and political philosopher he saw that one of the great aims of a nation should be the adoption of policies that will automatically set in motion the forces necessary for the uninterrupted employment of all the people, and that for this purpose there is needed such constant and regular increase in the quantity of money as will preserve from artificial and unnatural depression the prices of the products of labor.

For him it was not enough that the laborers actually employed were able in certain cases, with greater or less success, to uphold the wages paid; it was also necessary that the large numbers of laborers who were compulsorily idle should be called to employment by those who could profitably utilize their services.

By a restoration to silver of the unrestricted access to the mint, which it had enjoyed from the dawn of civilization, Mr. BLAND saw one of the great instrumentalities for maintaining, in connection with the annual yield of gold and carefully regulated issues of paper, a quantity of money sufficient for all the purposes of industry.

From his wide reading of economic literature and his experience and observation in the mining regions, he was aware that the world had never had and never would have too much of either of the precious metals or of both combined. To him the refusal of Governments to utilize to the fullest degree the output from the silver mines seemed like a deliberate rejection of one of the most beneficent of the bounties of nature.

The silver cause, therefore, appeared to Mr. BLAND to be the great humanitarian cause of the closing years of the century. It evoked the deepest sympathies of his nature, and appealed to him, not as an economical necessity merely, but, as well, as a high religious duty. With all the fervor of a crusader he entered upon its propaganda, and during all the years of his public life he was a tower of strength to those associated with him in the effort to restore silver to its historic place as a money metal of unrestricted coinage.

It is with this question of silver remonetization that Mr. BLAND'S public career will always be linked and associated, and it is undoubtedly with that question that he would wish history to especially connect him. He held, with all the force of religious conviction, that every interest of society and civilization demanded the unrestricted coinage of both gold and silver; and he devoted the best years of his life to the attempt to ingraft such a result upon the legislation of the United States.

Wherever, throughout the world, the money question has been discussed—and it has been discussed everywhere—the name of Mr. BLAND has become a synonym for silver. The terms "Bland law" and "silver law" are recognized the world over as synonymous. It is, however, but justice to the memory of Mr. BLAND to say that the so-called "Bland law"—the law of February 28, 1878—as proposed by him and passed by the House of Representatives, was a bill to authorize the free coinage of the standard silver dollar.

This was changed in the Senate to a bill which, instead of unrestricted coinage, provided for the purchase of from two to four million dollars per month of silver bullion, in which form, as the only practicable one in which its final passage could be secured, it was accepted by him and the other friends of silver and passed over the veto of the President.

The personal characteristics of Mr. BLAND were such as to endear him to all who knew him. While strong, determined, and unfaltering in the pursuit of duty, he was always genial, patient, and kindly. He was one of the few men in public life who knew how to make friends and yet could avoid making enemies. He had not an enemy in the world. All who came in contact with him knew that he carried into his public work every element of conscience and of rectitude that distinguished his perfect private life.

Like all men of true greatness, Mr. BLAND was a man of exceeding simplicity of character. His intellectual processes were of the most direct kind. He did not seek the aid of the false, the meretricious, or the gaudy. He disdained to resort to any argument that was not based upon what he believed to be immutable truth. Notwithstanding the bitterness sometimes caused by heated political debate, he never lost the esteem of his opponents. They knew him for what he was and respected him for the noble qualities of head and heart that they knew him to possess. Above all else, he was a man of profound sincerity of conviction and rectitude of purpose.

In private life Mr. BLAND was the soul of honor; he was the ideal husband, father, friend, citizen. In every relation and transaction his conduct was guided and governed by the highest standards.

We shall miss the genial smile and hearty greeting with which he was wont to meet his many friends; but the work which he performed will long continue to influence the minds and consciences of men.

Mr. BLAND leaves to his family a name and reputation of priceless value, and to his country an imperishable example of a noble, dignified, true, and faithful leadership in a great cause. His fame rests secure in the hearts of his countrymen.

He was a man of the class so well described in the lines of one of our own writers:

God give us men! A time like this demands
Strong minds, great hearts, true faith, and ready hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office can not buy;
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor—men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking!
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, in the few words which I shall utter to-day in regard to the life and character of Mr. BLAND I shall endeavor to speak of that life and character as it seemed to me. I shall endeavor to speak of him as I think he would have desired a friend to speak—that is, to tell the simple truth, without exaggeration in any way whatever.

Mr. President, I think it can be truthfully said that no man has served in Congress for the last twenty-five years who had a stronger hold upon the affections of the great body of the American people than RICHARD P. BLAND, of Missouri. While his life was conspicuous in many ways, it was preeminently so as the earnest, sincere, and devoted friend of the poor people; of the people who move in the humbler walks of life; the people who daily toil for their daily bread.

He had been intimately associated with them in their everyday life; he knew the difficulties under which they labored, the privations which they endured, and how hard the battle of life was for them, and every sympathy of his heart went out to them, and he spent his life in an earnest, constant, and never-ceasing effort to better their condition and to contribute to their happiness. Whatever in his judgment promised or tended to better their condition and to make their pathway less rugged and less difficult, he supported and advocated. And whatever added to their burdens or brought to them additional toil he opposed and resented as though it were a personal injury to himself.

Mr. BLAND believed that the change of policy upon the part of the Government in 1873 from a double to a single standard of money was a crime against the class of people to whose service his life was devoted. He believed that this change from the policy taught by the founders of the Republic brought suffering and want to many thousands of people whose condition in life made them least able to bear injustice and wrong; and, so believing, he began the great battle which he waged unceasingly for twenty-five years to right that wrong. He was the great and universally acknowledged leader in the fight.

Others grew weary, lost hope, ceased to battle or deserted to the enemy, but the faith of Mr. BLAND never wavered and his courage never faltered. He met defeat after defeat, but his purpose grew stronger and all the energies and resources of his great mind were brought to bear in the great contest that he waged against wealth and power. And while he did not live to see the great principles for which he contended triumphant in the nation, yet he did see the great party in which he was a conspicuous leader make the idea and the principle for which he had so long contended the leading and overshadowing issue in the contest for control of the Government.

It has been sometimes said that Mr. BLAND felt keenly disappointed that he was not selected to lead the Democratic ticket in 1896. This I know personally to be untrue. He said to me but a short time before the convention in 1896 that he thought it a mistake for his own State to have given instructions for him for President; that the cause was everything and the individual nothing; that his highest ambition in life was to see the cause succeed, and that the convention ought to be left entirely free to select that man whose leadership would contribute most to bring about the great reform that was so dear to his heart.

And his manly conduct while the convention was sitting and the earnestness and enthusiasm that he displayed on behalf of the ticket tended to show that he felt relieved rather than disappointed at the nomination made. That he felt keenly and deeply disappointed at the failure of Mr. Bryan to succeed, all of his intimate friends know; and while he never lost faith in the final triumph of the great cause, and while his voice was still heard urging his friends and followers to continue the contest, I think the great hope that it might be accomplished while he yet lived had passed away. I think that the disappointment which came from the defeat of the cause in 1896 contributed in part to the death of this great man.

It has been said that Mr. BLAND was a man of one idea, but this also is untrue. The records of the House show that in all the great questions which came before Congress while he was a member that he took a leading part in the discussions, always showing the highest intelligence and the most accurate and thorough knowledge of the issues involved. And in the great fight he made for the restoration of silver he believed there were other great questions involved. He believed that if the policy of our Government could be changed in regard to the money metals, the same power which brought about this change would be sufficiently potent to bring other changes, but that sooner or later, if the wrong was not righted, the Republic, which was founded on the idea of equality, would cease to be a Republic of the people, for whom he felt such a keen interest.

I know it seems commonplace to say that he was a thoroughly honest man, a truthful man, and earnest, sincere, unselfish man, a generous and just man, yet it was because of these great qualities that he was a great man—great because he has shown to the youth of this land that a man simple in his habits, modest and unpretending in his life, can, by the practice of the virtues I have named and by earnest effort to better the condition of his fellowman, leave behind him a name and a fame that will long be cherished as a precious heritage by his fellow-countrymen. And I earnestly believe that as the years go on the fame of RICHARD P. BLAND will grow greater and greater, as the history of his pure life and his high and lofty purposes become better known.

The people of every land and every clime who struggle for liberty, who fight for justice, who contend against the tyranny and injustice of great wealth and great power will long remember the name of the great Missourian, who was their friend, who fought their battle, who devoted his life to an earnest and sincere effort to better their condition.

The people of Missouri were not more devoted to him than were the people of my own State. He was our near neighbor. Hundreds of the people of Arkansas knew him personally, and when the news came that his life was at an end the sorrow and grief were universal.

I was present at his funeral. There were many thousands of people assembled around his grave. They came from every part of Missouri and from Arkansas. Hundreds in his own and the adjoining counties came in wagons, in buggies, on foot, and on horseback. They were the sturdy farmers of southwest Missouri—the men with whom he had been associated in his daily life—and as they looked upon his face for the last time each seemed to feel that he had suffered a personal loss and that the truest and best friend that the poor and helpless had ever known had passed to the great beyond.

And the thought came to me then that this love and this devotion of these people was far dearer to Mr. BLAND in his lifetime than all the wealth the world can bestow; and, having devoted his life to relieving the distress and suffering of the people, when the end of life drew near, that thought must have tended to illuminate the dark river over which he was soon to cross and tended to make the farther shore seem less to be dreaded and less to be feared.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, born and reared to early manhood in the State which I have the honor in part to represent in this body, the personal and public career of RICHARD PARKS BLAND was always looked to by the people of Kentucky with the most affectionate interest. When we can say of one who has completed the life work set before him and joined the innumerable caravan that passes on before, that he was a good citizen, a kind and considerate neighbor, a loving husband, and an affectionate father, and that to all these ennobling attributes he added the graces of the Christian gentleman, we have the embodiment of a good man, and the words of legitimate eulogy are almost exhausted.

All these things can be truthfully said of RICHARD PARKS BLAND. When he gave up the duties he had to perform in this life and passed to the other side to rest under the shade of the trees, there was no man who more completely represented American manhood, the conscientious American public servant, the unselfish American patriot than did RICHARD PARKS BLAND.

No man who has been a public servant for a quarter of a century almost, as was Mr. BLAND, and who was a participant in questions that excited the greatest public interest and the fiercest controversy ever excited less uncharitable or ungenerous criticism. Every man knew him to be honest. Everybody looked on him as an upright man. All of us, whether we differed from or agreed with him, recognized that he was following the course pointed out by the conscientious investigation of the question with which he was dealing and felt he was serving, to the best of his ability and according to the lights before him, the interests of the people who honored him with a seat in the American Congress, and, as he believed, the best interests of the people of the entire country.

Amiable he was, but his amiability was not the attribute of weakness. His amiability was the evidence of the innate gentility that came upon the earth when RICHARD BLAND was born.

He was in every sense of the word a national character, and it was that of the statesman and not the politician.

This, Mr. President, is not the time to discuss political differences. Questions which assume the gravest importance in the deliberations of the Federal Congress, questions which attract the widest attention with the American people, are temporal and transitory in their character, and in the face of the great unknown sink into comparative insignificance. It is a consoling reflection to the family and friends of Mr. BLAND that those who differed with him the most widely nevertheless regarded him with the same high estimate in which he was held by his closest political friends.

When he came to die, when the news flashed across the continent that this great and good man was about to be lost to his country forever, there was universal regret. National sorrow manifested everywhere, and it was to no degree tempered by any feeling of past political differences with this representative American.

I never heard a man speak of Mr. BLAND except in terms of affectionate regard, and I know that in his native State all the people of every party and persuasion looked on his life and on his career as an honor to the State that gave him birth, and they joined with the people of their sister State, the home of his adoption, in mourning his death as they to-day join in doing honor and reverence to his memory.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in the closing days of the Fiftieth Congress I formed the acquaintance of RICHARD PARKS BLAND. During the Fifty-first Congress it was my privilege to serve with him on the Committee of Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the House of Representatives. The acquaintance then formed ripened into a friendship which extended over a decade, growing warmer as the years passed. Death claimed Mr. BLAND on the 15th day of June, 1899. On that day his loyal and gentle life went out, leaving friendships to crystallize into sanctified memories. In conformity with an ancient and beautiful custom we this day devote a session of the Senate to paying tributes of respect to the memory of our lamented friend and official associate. The life and character of RICHARD P. BLAND need not the charity always benevolently extended to the dead. His was a pure and praiseworthy life.

He was unusually modest and retiring. He was neither self-asserting nor self-seeking. He sought the back seat rather than the front place in any meeting he happened to attend. His voice was low, his manner unobtrusive. Being of medium height and fair proportions, his physical presence harmonized with his disposition to avoid conspicuous notice. He was slow to enter into conversation with strangers, and the glamour of the social life of the capital had no charm for him. Anyone acquainted with his record as a public servant would have been at a loss on first meeting him to account for the source of his strength and the basis of his just fame as a parliamentary leader. Although an able and experienced jurist and a statesman of world-wide reputation, his was the manner and the dress of the well-to-do, well-read, and no ghborly farmer. His mildness of manner and gentleness of disposition in the home circle or in the committee room gave no forecast of the bold, fearless, and irrepressible representative, whose masterful advocacy of his settled and unchangeable convictions promptly secured and, without design, held for him an exalted place in the American Congress for more than twenty years.

The dashing, self-confident young college man encountering him unawares would have yielded the ground, not before a torrent of offensive declamation, but through self-confessed inability to answer the apparently simple interrogatories of a kind country gentleman in quest of knowledge.

He was a patient student. His inquiries were directed toward a definite purpose and all his energies were concentrated for the accomplishment of that purpose. He explored the realms of literature that he might reduce the strength of all recorded thought to the service of his cause. His knowledge of books was extensive, but of that knowledge his speeches only convey a partial view. To him the productions of imagination were of little service. His sympathies were moved by the matter-of-fact features of the problems confronting men. The ceaseless struggle of humanity for better average conditions touched his heart, engrossed his mind, and absorbed his life.

With earnestness amounting to intensity he devoted himself to the study and advocacy of such public measures as seemed to him calculated to crystallize justice into law. He believed that a great wrong was inflicted on the world by the demonetization of silver, and without variation or sign of change he addressed himself to the task of restoring that metal to its former privileges at the mints of the United States. The great contest for the restoration of silver has engaged the attention of the civilized world for a generation. Men of world-wide renown have given to the subject their best thought. With some it may have been a theme for mere academic debate; with others a stimulus for spasmodic effort and pyrotechnic display; but with RICHARD P. BLAND it was an issue—living, vital, momentous.

To his steady hand, unfailing constancy, and well-equipped mind, the honor and responsibility of leadership were given in this country without solicitation, question, or dispute. He was the leader of a movement rather than of a party. He was the exponent of a thought which found support in all parties and in all sections of the country. To him the scattered elements looked as to a standard bearer. With the assistance of able men from the ranks of every party, Mr. BLAND kept the issue so prominently before the country that for over sixteen years all parties felt constrained to promise fair terms to him and to his people. Defeat did not discourage him. With constancy, courage, and tenacity unsurpassed, he braved sneers, jeers, and opposition of every sort. Feeling conscious of the worth of his cause and the rectitude of his purposes, defeat left him instructed but not conquered. That success did not crown his efforts is a fact not recorded to his discredit. With him the fight closed only when the Master's summons came.

Had he been more inclined to assert himself, he would doubtless have been the Presidential candidate of the Democratic party in 1896, when for the first time the cause for which he had stood so long and so faithfully was approved by a convention of his party associates. But the valiant commander was not chosen to lead. His neighbors continued to reelect him to the House of Representatives, but failing health weighed heavily upon him during his last term of service in that body. I spent many evenings with Mr. BLAND at his Washington residence during the last session of Congress he was permitted to attend. He was my neighbor in this city, and in the light of a neighbor and a friend I knew him well. To know him was to become bound to him by ties of affectionate regard. In him simplicity of life and sincerity of heart were united with clearness of intellect, strength of purpose, and dauntless courage. During our last visit he seemed inclined to talk seriously of the future of his family. At the time my attention was not specially arrested, but on hearing of his unexpected death shortly thereafter I recalled what he had said as indicating that he must have then realized that his end was near and that his guiding hand would soon fail those he loved.

At the close of a long life spent in the public service he left his family in limited circumstances. Like many other distinguished members of Congress who had gone before him, Mr. BLAND had looked so steadfastly to his country's interests that he had neglected to give due attention to his own affairs. An honored name is the chief legacy left by him to his family. A celebrated Roman orator defined true honor as the concurrent approbation of good men. Measured by this fair test the name of RICHARD P. BLAND is a priceless treasure to his family. He was a man of honor. Men differed with his views sharply, and his positions on public questions were often assailed with bitterness; but no man ever had reason to question his integrity or the purity of his motives. Indirection was foreign to his nature. The makeshifts of concealment or evasion never found place in his public service. He was an open, frank, honest man. His character was his capital, and it never diminished in value. He was not the slave of vulgar ambition.

His was the ambition of the philanthropist seeking the triumph of a cause for the good of humanity. His repeated elections to Congress were accepted by him and recognized by his opponents as the victory of his cause rather than the glorification of the man. He became the embodiment of an idea to which his life was devoted. Public station was accepted as an opportunity to advance that idea. With the high office of Representative in Congress came many duties, which Mr. BLAND discharged with scrupulous regard for the public welfare, but the central and controlling object of his personal and official efforts was the remonetization of silver. His pronounced identity with that great question gained for him the sobriquet of "Silver Dick" and "Silver Dollar" BLAND. His name has been indelibly set in our laws and parliamentary history on the subject of coinage. This is not a fitting occasion to indulge in the task of weighing the merits of his contentions nor in speculating on the future of the issue on which the force of his life was expended. On the contest over that issue, inspired and ably maintained by him, his fame rests secure, irrespective of the merits. His motive rested on the immutable foundation of honesty.

The honest and able efforts of our departed friend will be remembered alike by his adherents and by his opponents with the sense of pride and gratification always felt by patriotic men in the presence of the demonstrated courage, fidelity, and virtue of a countryman.

Seclusion was his desire; unsolicited fame his reward. Detraction, that missile flung from little minds by vicious tongues, can not impair his fair fame. In every relation of life he was true and faithful. He endeavored, to the full measure of his ability, to leave the world better than he found it. Through example, he still lives among us. To him the mystery of death has been disclosed, and with the aid of Christian faith we may, with consolation, perceive immortality beyond that mysterious line.

The most eloquent agnostic of this generation, standing by the uncovered grave of one he had tenderly loved, said in anguish of spirit, "We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry." The absence of faith made room for that pitiable despair. I would not call the figure despicable, as the offspring of fear or the child of dishonesty. It springs not alone from want of faith in the truths of divine revelation, but likewise from a failure to fairly consider and justly estimate the necessary attributes of the higher, the nobler, the purer, the immortal elements combined with human nature. That part of man returned by mourning friends to mother earth was weak, dependent, and in peril from the moment of birth to the instant of death, and yet in death it is indestructible. During life it was the tenement of the invisible spirit which, vitalizing and illuminating, made of it the inspiration of our affections, the correspondent of our intellects, and the companion of our souls. The separation of the spirit from its tenement of clay is what we call death. The body, through decay, changes form, but is not destroyed.

Knowing that the gross objects visible to our imperfect sight can not be destroyed, how foolish seems the faithless one who would consign to a dark and boundless abyss of insensibility and nothingness the bright, vivifying, resplendent force which, even while fettered to common clay, penetrates the mysteries of the stars, solves the problems of the earth, measures the depths and conquers the currents of the seas, subjugates the passions of animal life, and brings to the aid of existence here an ever-increasing measure of order, love, benevolence, and lofty aspiration. The force is primary. It can not die. It is the soul of man. His conscience, his emotions, his thoughts, his yearnings for a higher and better life are but manifestations of its existence. A man of gigantic intellect and unfaltering faith has said that "to reason about faith is to doubt and deny."

As to faith in the immorta'ity of the soul, I take issue with the statement. The infidel mind must reason out of existence too many things of which every human being is more or less conscious before finding a firm basis for unbelief, accompanied by mental repose. Our friend was not annihilated when his weary mortal body surrendered to its final impulse. The earth could not reclaim more than its own. As by the eternal law of attraction each primary source recalls its scattered fragments, so to its Omnipotent Creator the spirit of our departed friend has been recalled. The legacy of his life and its ennobling example is the common heritage of all mankind. His lifelong course of undeviating rectitude secures to his afflicted family an imperishable title to honorable distinction. Well may the widow and children who mourn him find consolation in the words—

God gave, He took, He will restore.
He doeth all things well.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, no man ever laid down his life with a reputation freer from spot or blemish than did RICHARD P. BLAND. He served his State and country with a fidelity and singleness of purpose which has never been surpassed. Simple in his tastes, intensely domestic in his feelings, devoted to his family, he was a pure patriot, an honest man, and a faithful public servant.

In my public service it was my good fortune to be intimately associated with him for years and to reckon him amongst my warm personal friends, and in all the years of this intimate association I never saw an action of his nor heard a word from him which was not becoming a Christian and a gentleman. No man of purer character or more blameless public or private life ever honored an American constituency by faithful and honorable service. If a good name is better than great riches, then he left to his family an inheritance most desirable and one which will endure when the great fortunes of those who have devoted their lives to money getting shall have passed away.

Mr. BLAND was preeminently a man of the people. Utterly incapable of being swayed from their interest by an advantage to himself, he was so splendidly poised that no prospect, no matter how alluring, could disturb his equilibrium. When he was being voted for in a great convention of his countrymen, by the political party in which he had spent his life, for the highest place in the gift of the people, he, away from telegraphic communication, with no party of friends about him, was pursuing the even tenor of his everyday life at his quiet home in Missouri in the happy association of his wife and children. He was ready then, as he was at all times, to assume any responsibility which his countrymen might impose on him, or to follow the quiet, even tenor of his own home life, without regret and without repining, if permitted to do so.

Unselfish and patriotic, he gave his life to his country, and left to his family a name which will live in the hearts of his countrymen. He was one of the men to see at a very early day, clearly and distinctly, what he believed to be a great wrong perpetrated upon civilized mankind by the financial legislation of this country and others about 1873, and to the repeal of that legislation in this country he devoted his days and his nights. While his efforts were unavailing, while he failed to accomplish the great purpose he had in view, no bitterness disturbed the calm serenity of his mind, and no loss of hope for the future or of faith in the Republic ever found lodgment in his heart. With an unfaltering trust in an overruling Providence, and an unshaken faith in the integrity and intelligence of his countrymen, he had no doubt that the best would result from agitation and discussion, and that whether he had his way or not, that the best results to the American people would at last be brought about.

No one who had the honor and pleasure of knowing the man as I did could fail to love him, to admire and respect him, and I shall cherish through all my future life the memory of his friendship as one of the blessings which a kind Providence has granted me. His name, his family, and his memory belong to the nation.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it is but natural when we rise to speak of our dead associates that words of praise come to our lips. I shall speak of the Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, now dead, as I have frequently spoken of him living. I have discovered no excellencies since his death that I did not recognize and appreciate when he was living.

The Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND for many years filled an important position in American legislative affairs, and it is but fitting that we should pay respect to one who has discharged all the great duties devolving upon him with so much ability and with so much credit not only to himself but to his country.

He was left an orphan when very young, and struggled with adverse conditions, but did not fail. By his unaided energy he acquired an academic education and fitted himself for the responsible duties that ultimately devolved on him.

In his early manhood he went to Missouri; later to California, where he remained a number of years. I am not familiar with the details of his life in the far West, but I know he was interested in the great mining industries of that country and that he practiced his profession and held an office of honor and trust.

In 1865 he returned to Missouri and entered on the practice of his profession. He was elected to the Forty-third Congress as a Democrat. He was repeatedly reelected, and when he died he was still bearing the commission of the people of Missouri in the House of Representatives. He was a member of every Congress from his first election to the last, save the fifty-fourth Congress, for which he was defeated by a majority of 70 votes out of a total vote for himself and opponent of 33,700. He was reelected to the Fifty-fifth Congress by a majority of nearly 5,000.

My first acquaintance with Mr. BLAND was in the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress. He was at that time chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining. I soon learned to appreciate his sterling qualities and formed an admiration and an affection for him that lasted until his death.

At the next session of Congress he introduced a bill for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and passed it through the House of Representatives by a large majority. It did not pass this body, but the result was the passage of a compromise measure known as the Bland bill, which restored the silver dollar to the circulation of the country.

From 1876 to the time of his death his name was closely associated with the great economic struggle, begun in the United States largely by his influence and support, for the restoration of silver as primary money in the currency of the world.

He believed that the restoration of silver as primary money was in the interest of all classes, but especially to the interest of the producing classes. His earnest and intelligent support of the measure in Congress and out of Congress made his name and fame familiar, not only to the people of United States, but to the political economists throughout the world.

It is not strange that when his political party, after a spirited contest, incorporated that principle in its platform thousands of men of that faith turned to him as the logical candidate of their party for President. But Mr. BLAND had never advocated a financial policy for the advantage that might accrue to him; and when another received an honor that many thought belonged to him, he accepted the result without criticism or complaint and gave the candidate his untiring support.

The great economic principle for which he had contended for so many years had secured a permanent place in the political creed of his party, and that was enough for one who had always put principle above personal and party advantage.

RICHARD P. BLAND was an earnest, courageous supporter of what he considered right, an equally earnest opponent of what he considered wrong.

He was independent, self-reliant, obedient to his conscience, impartial in judgment, and could not be swerved from duty by policy or public clamor. He was an honest man, a patriot, an American statesman of the best type.

His devotion to duty, as he saw it, with reference to the financial questions before Congress; his clear comprehension of the character and importance of the questions, and what it involved; his logical and forcible presentation of his views on many occasions, will always associate his name with that important and still unsettled question, whether the world can dispense with the use of silver as primary money or not, and his influence on that question has not ceased with his death.

It may be well doubted whether anyone who has served in Congress during the last twenty-five years has created for himself a more enduring memory than RICHARD P. BLAND, a memory untarnished, a memory that may well be the pride of the people who honored him with their support, and whom in turn he honored by his worthy conduct in public and private life.

No higher praise can be bestowed on living or dead than to say his life is a worthy example for American youth, and this we may say of RICHARD P. BLAND.

As a Representative in Congress he secured and maintained the confidence of his constituents and the country at large for loyalty to principle, devotion to duty, courage and capacity in the discharge of the obligations and duties of a great trust, and his life and public service must be an encouragement to welldoing to those who may have aspirations to succeed him in public life. Good and faithful public servant, the only reward he desired was the approval of his own conscience and the approbation of the people for the discharge of his public duties in a way to serve the great body of the American people.

This meed of praise will not be withheld by even his political opponents.

[Mr. ALLISON addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, death has stricken the name of RICHARD PARKS BLAND from the roll of the House of Representatives.

Another now fills the seat which he occupied for nearly a quarter of a century, and the world goes on in its accustomed ways, even as the sea rolls on in restless, unchanging mood when some noble craft has sunk into its depths. But hard by the rolling waves are those who miss and mourn and weep for the unreturning sail.

It is the old, old story, often repeated in manifold phases in our American life, that is told to-day. The poor boy going west, far away from his old Kentucky home, plunging into the frontier life, fighting Indians and mining metals; the struggling youth gaining little by little the rewards of toil; the lawyer growing into confidence and competence; the husband and father planting his home in Missouri and gathering to it the things that conduce to refinement, comfort, hospitality, and good cheer, and making it the center of his life work amidst those whom he loved and who in turn loved him. Then the representative of the people in the Congress of the United States and the ripe and forceful statesman, trustworthy and trusted in all things, seeking no sordid or selfish end, veraciously acting up to the admonition of Wolsey, "Let all the ends thou aimest at be thy country's, God's, and truth's."

The House of Representatives is the training school and the strenuous battlefield of American public life. There the Paladins have fleshed their maiden swords. The Representative is the one person of all the hundred thousands of Federal agents who is chosen by the people and in him more than in any other is reflected the genius of a people's government. There can be no loftier office. Success in that forum, as in the conflict of arms, must be and is accepted as the just test of merit.

Orators, scholars, authors, lawyers, and men distinguished in all the walks of human endeavor often go there with high reputations for ability and disappear and make no sign. Others hitherto unknown to the country rise there to eminence, honor, and power. Mr. BLAND fitted the House of Representatives and the House of Representatives fitted him. He studied the questions of the day with conscientious diligence, and his speeches upon them reflect the best thought in favor of the propositions he maintained.

He was always at his post, attentive to his duties, ready, logical, earnest, cogent in debate, the peer of any who crossed his lance. Force of energy and force of character, a certain adaptability to the rough and ready fight, are the elements of success in that body, and only the strong and the sufficient man can succeed. Mr. BLAND was a success. His name became a fortress and a sword and a flag to his followers, and the countersign that he gave them was worthy of him—"Put the cause above the man."

For twelve terms he was chosen a Representative. The tie that binds united the faithful constituency and the faithful public servant. Nothing but death or promotion could have dissolved it. The fact speaks, and the fact will forever speak, his deathless eulogy when the lips that praise him to-day are silent.

Jackson, Van Buren, Polk, Pierce, Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley found in the House of Representatives the stepping-stones to the highest office that any man on earth can hold, the Presidency of the United States; and for a time the star of promise hovered over BLAND. The great historic party to which he belonged, and of which he was in all his life a true type and representative, contemplated him as its candidate for this great office.

The tenor of events favored him. The convention met. It was spurred to aggressive action by the vain makeshifts and disappointments which had attended previous efforts to restore to its place the ancient hard silver money of the Constitution and the country, the money whose story is the history of civilization. It was quickened in its hopes by an aroused public opinion formed under conditions that gave omens of victory. It adopted as its leading principle the idea of which BLAND had been a pioneer and the constant and leading champion, and it cleared deck for action. His friends were justly elated. The door seemed to swing open for him to vast possibilities of usefulness and honor. And then the star of his destiny declined as quickly as it had shone forth.

But it left him as it had found him, in the unruffled repose of his country home and in equanimity and sweetness of spirit. If ambition did not lead him up the shining heights, neither did it fling him from the Tarpeian Rock. No words of complaint or reproach or disappointment fell from his lips. He was ready for duty, and duty he did with loyal fervor. He emerged from the conflict higher in the respect and good will of the people than when he entered it, unscathed in reputation, approved in character, superior to the illusions of ambition, and undisturbed by its fickle blandishments. The world knew him now as a well-balanced, right-hearted, and just-thinking man, worthy of its honor and its trust.

Xanthippe, the wife of Socrates, said that in the myriad revolutions that had overtaken Athens and their own home she had always seen the same expression on the face of Socrates going forth in the morning and coming back in the evening. In serenity of temper, in philosophic mood, and in the even conduct of life the Missouri statesman was not unlike the great Greek; and the great Commonwealth of the Middle West that has sent to field, House, and Senate so many illustrious sons has given to our history no worthier name.

The delegation from Virginia, of which I had the honor to be a member, voted for Mr. BLAND for the Presidential nomination, and stuck to him until his own delegation recognized the then self-evident fact that the able and brilliant orator from Nebraska had won the convention's favor by his wonderful eloquence, and had so fixed its choice. He was well worthy of it, and no one recognized his merit more readily than BLAND, and no one had a higher opinion of BLAND than Bryan.

Whatever had been the result, BLAND would have been an excellent candidate. Had he been elected we would have had an old-fashioned Democrat in the White House, worthy of the party of Jefferson and of Jackson. He would have felt his responsibilities as conscientiously as any man who ever sat in the Executive chair. Accessible to all, he would have heard and considered all, and would have acted with discretion and decision. He would have been the relentless foe to monopoly, the devotee of equal rights, the lover of the Constitution, and the friend of the people, without sectional hatred or partiality. His simplicity would have attracted to him that ingenuous affection that delights in plain, direct, and unostentatious ways, for he was indeed, as the laureate says of Wellington, "in his simplicity sublime," and like Washington in that "his modesty was equal to his merit."

Mr. President, "there is a moral to all human tales." That which belongs to the career of RICHARD PARKS BLAND is worthy to be cherished. His life was characterized by no particular feats of brilliancy, but its force and influence were steady and constant, pertinacious, continuous, and faithful, "enduring to the end." There was nothing of dramatic incident about it. He was a real man, and the cast of his mind was realistic. He took life seriously and dealt with it honestly and bravely, seeing its plain facts and plain obligations in no grotesque or fanciful shapes nor in lurid or colored lights, but in just proportions and in the white light of truth. He had no affectations or attitudes or poses, and as it never occurred to him to mislead or deceive others, so he did not mislead or deceive himself. Of this character are the world's great body of most useful and successful men.

"I must dazzle and astonish," said Bonaparte, and he did dazzle and astonish the world. But none were more dazzled and astonished than himself. He was dazzled by Moscow, and he lost his army in the Russian snows. Who more astonished than he when the holdfast grit of Prussia and England wrenched the scepter from his grasp? Who more astonished than he when the matter-of-fact "nation of shopkeepers," as he called them, and, in truth be it said, hard and bluff conqueror, rejected his theatrical overtures of protection and hurried him off to his island cage, an extinct volcano like himself.

BLAND was nothing of "the dazzle and astonish" kind. He would have been a poor actor in a melodramatic troup. He was an Anglo-Saxon, an American through and through. He stood for the common weal and the common right. His life was dominated by the genius of his race, whose highest expression is found in its steadfast common sense.

Nature is altruistic. She has so made man that he can not live unto himself alone save as an unfinished and insufficient creature. Neither can he do anything for himself alone save in scant and imperfect manner. She has correlated, interlaced, and fused together the lives and fortunes of men in social unity. The food and clothing of the laborer are the products of many climes and many hands, of many toils and many tears. A cotton handkerchief, a tin cup, a pin, a nail, a match—who can make one of them by himself alone? Yet by the united toil of others how cheap to everyone!

This thought is the germ of union and the bond of fraternity. Throughout all human kind each must of necessity contribute his just part to the common weal. Nothing is sadder than working for self, the fruit unshared by others. And well is this illustrated in the story of Enoch Arden, who, deemed dead by his wife, found her wedded to another, and who, concealing himself, that she might not know he lived, was forced to work for himself alone.

> Yet since he did but labor for himself,
> Work without hope, there was not life in it
> Whereby the man could live.

The poorest man on earth is he who has piled up riches by selfish and sinister methods and who is constrained by his surplus and cumbrous wealth to look around for objects which may stir to life his latent and long-suppressed regard for others and make company for his lonely and discontented spirit. But rich indeed is he who spends as he goes his life and his work and his means and whatever is his for others with a free, unstinting hand and makes himself no bankrupt debtor to lost opportunity for doing good.

The life of BLAND was altruistic, like that of many worthy representatives, and it is the glory and safety of our race and of our country that it has many such of all shades of political opinions. He lived and worked for home, country, and friends. His democracy was a religion. It possessed him heart and hand and soul. Offending none, he made no enemies. All gave him respect and all trusted him; a tribute rare and honorable and blessed to those who gave as well as to him who received; a tribute bespeaking in the giving the love of truth and justice that lies forever in the human heart. Clear in his great office as representative of the people, he died in peace, with their confidence and love about him, and he leaves to them and to his country and to his family and friends a memory of sweet savor and a name without a stain.

They laid him to rest beneath a hickory tree in the churchyard at Lebanon, in the Ozark hills of Missouri, his home, and there he sleeps well. The strong, stout-fibered tree is a fitting emblem of his life. The melodies of the birds which sing in its branches as the springtime renews its green leaves are his fitting requiem.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, RICHARD PARKS BLAND was of the highest type of American manhood. His life was devoted to doing good, and his name is a household word.

On the discovery of the Comstock, in 1859, Carson County, of Utah, included the country which now composes the State of Nevada. Within a year after this great discovery more than 30,000 people were assembled in the mining region of which Virginia City was the center. It was a genuine mining excitement. Under such conditions, in protecting the rights of the weak and maintaining law and order, individual character was rapidly developed.

Mr. BLAND, although quite a young man, immediately became a marked figure. Judge Cradlebaugh, one of the judges of Utah Territory, was assigned to Carson County. Judge Childs, a Mormon, was judge of the Utah probate court, which had very large jurisdiction under the Utah statutes. Genoa, about 30 miles from Virginia City, was the county seat.

In August, 1860, after some months' residence in the Territory and active participation in mining operations, Mr. BLAND was, on my motion, admitted to the bar, and at once engaged actively in the practice of the law. He was a strong character, courageous and industrious, and enjoyed from the first confidence and respect in a community where weak men were ignored. In the fierce excitement of conflicting interests which made others waver, falter, and fail, he was firm and constant. The judges frequently remarked in my hearing that Mr. BLAND'S preparation of his cases was thorough, and that his clear and straightforward presentation of them was most convincing. If the members of the bar who were associated with him during his residence in Nevada were still living, they would gladly bear testimony to the virtues and manhood of Mr. BLAND. But so far as I am able to learn, I am his only surviving associate at the bar while Nevada was a part of Utah.

It gives me great pleasure to say of him that he was kind, generous, intelligent, industrious, and good. He won the love of those who knew him well and the respect of all to an extent that few, if any others, enjoyed. He did not remain in Nevada long enough to take part in the events of bonanza times, but a future was open to him when he left, and his name is still cherished by the surviving pioneers of Nevada wherever they may be found. The independence of character, the firmness of resolution, and the adhesion to principle which were shown during his short career in Nevada were fully exemplified and made known to the whole country during his long service in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLAND'S views on all great national questions were known of all men. His position was never doubtful. His life in the West and in Congress furnishes an example which will not be forgotten, but will be emulated by the strongest and best of those who shall come after us.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, RICHARD PARKS BLAND, to whose memory we pay tribute to-day, was born on August 19, 1835, in the county of Ohio, in the State of Kentucky.

His father, Stoughton Edward Bland, was a native Kentuckian and a descendant of the Blands of Revolutionary fame and was educated for a Presbyterian minister. Owing to ill health, he engaged in farming and was so engaged at the time of his death in the year 1842.

His mother was a Miss Nall, daughter of Richard Parks Nall, of Kentucky, and died in that State in the year 1849. By the death of the father the family was left largely dependent upon their own labor.

Anxious to obtain an education, young BLAND worked during the summer for six and seven dollars per month to enable him to attend school during the winter. He attended Hartford, Ky., Academy and took a teacher's course one year.

On leaving that institution at the age of 18, he began teaching; taught two terms in his native county, and then, going to Wayne County, Mo., taught one term, and went to California in 1855, where he taught school and studied law.

From California he went to the then Territory of Utah, and was elected treasurer of Carson County and held that office from 1860 until the organization of the State government of Nevada. He was admitted to the bar by the United States district court in Utah.

In 1865 he returned to Missouri and located at Rolla, in Phelps County, for the practice of law, in partnership with his brother, Charles C. Bland, now one of the judges of the court of appeals in the eastern district of Missouri.

In 1868 he removed to Lebanon, Mo., which was his home thereafter, continuing the practice of the law and conspicuously participating in the discussion of the public questions then agitating the country. In November, 1872, he was the nominee of the Democratic party for Representative in Congress from the Eighth Congressional district, and was elected to the Forty-third Congress, beginning March 4, 1873.

In 1873 he married Miss Virginia Elizabeth Mitchell, daughter of Gen. E. Y. Mitchell, of Rolla, Mo.

He was successively renominated and reelected a Representative in the Forty-fourth, Forty-fifth, Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses.

He was renominated for the Fifty-fourth Congress and defeated by the stay-at-home voters, caused by the discontent of the Democrats with the Administration, which resulted in the defeat of eight other Democratic nominees for Congress in Missouri.

In 1896 Mr. BLAND was renominated for Representative in the Fifty-fifth Congress and was elected.

In 1898 he was nominated for the fourteenth time and was elected, for the thirteenth time, a Representative in the Fifty-sixth Congress, beginning March 4, 1899, and died at 4.30 o'clock in the morning of June 15, 1899, before the Fifty-sixth Congress had convened, having served through eleven Congresses—Forty-third to Fifty-third, both inclusive, twenty-two consecutive years—and then through the Fifty-fifth Congress, two years more. During his illustrious career in the House his principal committee service was as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, of which he was the chairman in the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-second, and Fifty-third Congresses.

In the Forty-fourth Congress, on July 31, 1876, Hon. Randall L. Gibson, of Louisiana, presented a joint resolution (No. 159) for the appointment of a Congressional commission to inquire into the relative value of gold and silver and kindred questions, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

On August 5 Hon. S. S. Cox reported a resolution similar to Mr. Gibson's, which was passed on the same day and reported to the Senate August 7 and referred to the Committee on Finance, and on August 8 Senator Sherman reported from the Finance Committee S. 1037, in substantially the same language as the House resolution.

On August 15 Senator Morrill, after explaining the slight variance of S. 1037 and the House resolution and the lateness in the Senate, asked the Senate to pass the House concurrent resolution, and it was passed. In pursuance of this joint resolution the Senate appointed Senators JOHN P. JONES, Lewis V. Bogy, and George S. Boutwell, and the House appointed Representatives Randall L. Gibson, George Willard, and Richard P. Bland, and the experts were Hon. William S. Groesbeck, of Ohio, and Prof.

Francis Bowen, of Massachusetts, with George M. Weston, of Maine, as secretary.

This "United States monetary commission" made a most thorough, critical, and exhaustive inquiry into the whole monetary question in all its relations, and through our foreign ministers obtained reports upon the monetary systems of twenty-one of the leading nations of the world, written answers to written interrogatories from many eminent persons in the United States and foreign countries, and took the testimony of twenty-five eminent persons; all of which they submitted to Congress on March 2, 1877, in the Senate by S. Report 703, in two volumes—an invaluable treasure of information and facts.

Through this investigation Mr. BLAND became thoroughly conversant with the monetary question and an intelligent, fearless, and aggressive advocate of bimetallism by the restoration of the standard silver dollar to free, unlimited, and independent coinage equally with gold at the old ratio existing from 1837 to the coinage act of 1873 depriving it of any coinage right. He never wavered or faltered in his position to the end of his life. On December 13, 1876, in the Forty-fourth Congress, Mr. BLAND offered a substitute for H. R. 3635, favorably reported by him on July 19, for the free, unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollar equally with gold with full legal-tender power. This substitute was agreed to and passed and sent to the Senate, where no action was taken.

In the Forty-fifth Congress, at the called session, on November 5, 1877, Mr. BLAND moved to suspend the rules and pass "An act to authorize the free coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," which was agreed to and passed, and sent to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Finance.

On November 21, 1877, Senator ALLISON, from the Finance Committee, reported the bill to the Senate, with amendments, striking out the free-coinage provision and inserting the purchasing clause of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 of silver per month and the provision for an international monetary conference. On February 15, 1878, the amendments were agreed to and the bill as amended was passed and returned to House, where on February 21 the Senate amendments were agreed to and the bill passed. On February 28, 1878, the bill was vetoed by President Hayes and passed over his veto on the same day and became a law. From that day to his death Mr. BLAND used every effort promising any chance of success to secure the free and unlimited coinage of silver equally with gold and to prevent the repeal of the law of February 28, 1878.

In the Fifty-third Congress, in March, 1894, Mr. BLAND's bill requiring the immediate coinage into standard silver dollars of the profit or seigniorage in the bullion purchased under the Sherman law of July 14, 1890, amounting to $55,156,680, and then the coinage of the remainder of such bullion into such dollars, to be used in redeeming and canceling the Treasury notes of July 14, 1890, issued to purchase such bullion then outstanding, to the amount of $152,951,280, was passed, sent to the Senate and passed, and vetoed by President Cleveland on March 29, 1894.

Mr. BLAND, during his service, was the earnest advocate of a tariff for revenue, and an equally earnest opponent of a high protective tariff and opposed the recharter of the national banks.

When the McKinley tariff bill was pending, Mr. BLAND offered an amendment providing, substantially, that foreign manufactured products purchased by the exchange or by the proceeds of exported farm products should be admitted free of duty.

After President Cleveland's veto of the Bland seigniorage bill bimetallism became an exciting question, and its friends began an earnest, vigorous campaign to secure delegates to the national Democratic convention in 1896 who could neither be corrupted nor intimidated to a surrender of that principle.

It was believed in Missouri that some members of the State central committee were not friendly to the free and unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollar equally with gold at the old ratio. Many meetings were held and a State Democratic convention was called, by order of the State central committee, to meet at Pertle Springs, Mo., on the 6th day of August, 1895. The convention met, with strong delegations from almost every county in the State, made Mr. BLAND chairman, and passed resolutions strongly favoring free-silver coinage equally with gold. There was in the convention a strong feeling to indorse Mr. BLAND for the nomination for the Presidency in 1896. This movement was strongly opposed by Mr. BLAND, and no action in that direction was taken.

The feeling, however, continued to grow in strength, notwithstanding Mr. BLAND took the position that it was not wise for Missouri to have a Presidential candidate. His sincerity was never questioned, but he could not control his friends.

When the State convention assembled at Sedalia, Mo., on the 15th day of April, 1896, the delegates were almost unanimous for Mr. BLAND as one of the delegates at large to the Chicago convention and for indorsing him as the choice of Missouri for the nomination for President.

Mr. BLAND's position was characteristic. He said:

If I am the candidate of this State for the Presidential nomination, it would not be becoming in me to go as a member of the delegation from this State to the convention.

He was consequently not chosen as a delegate, but was unanimously indorsed by the convention as the candidate of Missouri for the Presidency.

He returned to his home, near Lebanon, Mo., and remained there until after the national convention had made its nomination, refusing the importunities of his friends to attend meetings anywhere or to do aught that might be construed as electioneering for himself or promotive of his candidacy for nomination. His candidacy was not of his own seeking. The good people of Missouri had seen distinguished gentlemen of acknowledged abilities and high character, eminent and influential in party councils and intrusted with high official positions, who for years had been outspoken advocates of bimetallism and professed friends of silver, turn their backs upon their past records, and to the money power and executive power, freely exerted, "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning."

Knowing Mr. BLAND's sincerity and honesty of purpose, his uncompromising integrity, his moral courage, and unyielding firmness, and his lifelong devotion to and advocacy of the restoration of bimetallism, they naturally regarded him as the personification of that monetary principle. The Democratic national convention met in Chicago on July 7, 1896, and completed its organization and adopted its platform on July 9. Most of the nominations for the Presidency were made on the night of July 9, and the remaining ones on the morning of July 10, when the balloting began.

Fourteen distinguished gentlemen received votes on the first ballot, the result of which for the seven receiving the highest number of votes was announced as follows: RICHARD P. BLAND, 235; William J. Bryan, 137; Robert E. Pattison, 97; J. C. S. Blackburn, 82; Horace Boies, 67; John R. McLean, 54, and Claude Matthews, 37.

The result of the second ballot for the three receiving the highest number of votes was as follows: BLAND, 281; Bryan, 197, and Pattison, 100.

The result of the third ballot for the two receiving the highest number of votes was: BLAND, 291; Bryan, 219.

The fourth ballot resulted in 241 for BLAND and 280 for Bryan.

At the beginning of the fifth ballot ex-Governor William J. Stone, of Missouri, one of the delegates at large from that State, addressed the convention, saying:

Two or three days since I received this note, which I will now read in your hearing, from RICHARD PARKS BLAND:

"I wish it to be understood that I do not desire the nomination unless it is the judgment of the free-silver delegates that I would be the strongest candidate. If it should at any time appear that my candidacy is the least obstruction to the nomination of any candidate who is acceptable to the free-coinage delegates in the convention, or one more acceptable to a majority of those delegates than myself, I wish my name at once unconditionally withdrawn from further consideration. I am willing to waive the State instructions for me, if need be, and let the free-silver delegates decide the whole matter. The cause must be put above the man."

I came to this great city as one of the delegates from Missouri, voicing the sentiment of the Democracy of that State, to present for your deliberate consideration the name of that illustrious commoner for whom many of you have expressed preference by your votes in this convention. To those who have been our friends in the struggle I desire now to return my grateful appreciation. But, following the directions of Mr. BLAND himself, that whenever a majority of the silver delegates in this convention shall have expressed a preference for another he desired his name unconditionally and peremptorily withdrawn, I now, in the name of Missouri, lower the standard under which we have fought throughout this convention, and in its place I lift that of the gifted and glorious son of Nebraska.

The nominations for the Vice-Presidency were made on July 11. Mr. BLAND on the first ballot, without having been nominated and with the votes of Missouri cast for others, received 62 votes.

On second ballot, when many votes were being cast for Mr. BLAND and Missouri was called, ex-Governor Stone said:

The State of Missouri presented the name of one of its citizens for the Presidential nomination. In the wisdom of this convention another was selected. The delegation has no authority to present the name of that citizen for the second place upon the ticket. If it is done by this convention, it must be done of its accord, without solicitation by the Missouri delegation—

And cast the votes of Missouri for other names.

On the second ballot 294 votes were given to Mr. BLAND.

On the third ballot 255 votes were given to Mr. BLAND.

After the announcement of the result of the third ballot, ex-Governor Stone addressed the convention, saying:

I desire on behalf of Missouri, and as the friend of Mr. BLAND, to express to you our grateful appreciation of your kindness. I am now in receipt of a telegram from Mr. BLAND, in which he says, substantially, that he would deem it unwise and impolitic to nominate both candidates from the west side of the Mississippi River. He directs me to say that the nomination of Mr. Bryan has his warm and hearty approval, and he thinks the nomination for the Vice-Presidency should be made with one object alone in view, and that is the strengthening the ticket. Accordingly, he directs me to say that he wishes his name withdrawn from the consideration of this convention for that purpose.

Mr. BLAND remained quietly at his home during the sessions of the Chicago convention, gracefully accepted the result, and entered most heartily into the campaign for the success of the nominees. Immediately after the convention an effort was made to induce him to become a candidate for the nomination for governor of Missouri. He positively declined, saying he would prefer to continue in Congress. He was then again nominated for Congress in the Eighth Missouri Congressional district—in which he was defeated in 1894—and was triumphantly elected.

The most conspicuous efforts of Mr. BLAND in his long and historic career in public life were his earnest, able, and persistent advocacy of the restoration of bimetallism by the free coinage of the standard silver dollar equally with gold at the old ratio, his opposition to the recharter of the national banks, and his advocacy of the right of the Government to issue the paper currency of the country, and, of the reduction of tariff taxation to a revenue basis.

His public life was exceptionally upright, exemplary, and honorable; free from any suspicion, even, of anything disreputable, corrupt, or dishonorable.

His success in public life did not in the least affect him in his manner or bearing. He continued through life the same plain and unassuming gentleman, avoiding, rather than seeking, public attention, notoriety, or ostentation.

His habits were simple, abstemious, and exemplary.

He was a pleasant associate, a true friend, a faithful and devoted husband, a loving and kind father.

He has bequeathed to his country, his friends, and his bereft wife and children an honored name, "a good name better than precious ointment," "rather to be chosen than great riches," and a private and public life worthy of all emulation.

Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect and love for Mr. BLAND, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to: and (at 3 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 11, 1900, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 10, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PORTO RICO.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I report back the bill (H. R. 8245) to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON. All points of order on the bill are reserved, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] reserves all points of order on the bill.

REVIEW OF THE WORLD'S COMMERCE FOR 1899.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 31.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, by direction of the Committee on Printing, asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 14,000 copies of the general summary entitled Review of the World's Commerce for the year 1899, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 10,000 for the use of the Department of State; and 8,000 copies of Commercial Relations of the United States for the year 1899, including the general summary, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 for the use of the Department of State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

YEARBOOK OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR 1899.

Mr. HEATWOLE. I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 77.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, by the same authority, asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed of part 2 of the Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture for 1899, issued in accordance with section 73, paragraph 2, chapter 23, Statutes at Large, 1895, issued under the title of "Yearbook of the United States Department of Agriculture," a special edition of 5,000 copies, on sized and supercalendered paper, to be bound in best quality of book cloth, subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, for distribution abroad, and especially during the Universal Exposition at Paris, 1900, to agricultural, educational, and other public and scientific foreign institutions and libraries and to public men especially engaged in work beneficial to agriculture: Provided, That in the distribution of this edition abroad, paragraph 79 of said section 73, of chapter 23, volume 28, Statutes at Large, 1895, is hereby suspended.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the several votes was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7433. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 8876. An act granting the right of way to the Minnesota and Manitoba Railroad Company across the ceded portion of the Chippewa (Red Lake) Indian Reservation, in Minnesota.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 9384. An act to attach the county of Foard, in the State of Texas, to the Fort Worth division of the northern district of Texas, and provide that all process issued against defendants residing in said county shall be returned to Fort Worth; and

H. R. 60. An act to create the northwestern division of the northern district of Georgia for judicial purposes and to fix the time and place for holding court therein.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 2581. An act to incorporate the National White Cross of America, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

S. 2493. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for land in certain cases—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

S. 2883. An act to change the characteristic of Cape Cod light, Massachusetts—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2924. An act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Colorado Springs, in the State of Colorado—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 3430. An act to increase the efficiency of the Subsistence Department of the United States Army—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 3616. An act to authorize the payment of traveling allowances to enlisted men of the regular and volunteer forces when discharged by order of the Secretary of War and stated by him as entitled to travel pay—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill 2538 and the report. It is the bill providing for the Isthmian Canal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for a reprint of House bill 2538, and also of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the title of the bill, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. HEPBURN. A bill providing for the construction of a canal to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. The present edition of the bill has been entirely exhausted.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, pending the request for unanimous consent, I should like to ask the gentleman a question. Is it the purpose of the gentleman to bring this bill up for consideration during the present session of this Congress?

Mr. HEPBURN. That, you know, the gentleman from Iowa can not answer. He can say that it is his purpose to bring this bill up if he can.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Well, Mr. Speaker, I should like to know what is the purpose of the gentleman's colleagues?

Mr. HEPBURN. I will refer the gentleman from Kentucky to my colleagues.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I have no objection to a reprint of the bill, but it does seem to me unnecessary unless we are going to consider the bill. I feel warranted in saying that there is no objection to the consideration of it on this side, and I think the gentleman ought to give the House some information as to what his ultimate intentions are with regard to the consideration of the measure.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky knows as well as I that no individual member can state whether a bill will be considered by this House or not. All I can say is that if I can effect that consideration it will be done.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for a reprint of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

SIOUX CITY AND PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. POWERS (when the Committee on Pacific Railroads was called). Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business on this call is with the Committee on Pacific Railroads—on the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad bill.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before the House before for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont has fifteen minutes reserved of his time.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBERT. As I understood, on yesterday when the House adjourned we had under consideration the agricultural appropriation bill, under the five-minute rule, and my idea was that that business was to be resumed this morning and continued until 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That is hardly a point of order; but the Chair not seeing the chairman of the committee in the House, could not keep the House waiting, and of course the next thing was a call of the committees.

Mr. POWERS. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that the bill provides for the appointment of a commission consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney-General, and the Secretary of the Interior, to settle the indebtedness in favor of the Government against the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, which amounts in round numbers to about $4,000,000. The Committee on Pacific Railroads presents this as a unanimous report, and urges it upon the House for many reasons, principal among which are the facts that a like commission succeeded in settling the indebtedness of the Union Pacific and of the Central Pacific railroads, to the great satisfaction of the people of this country, and we believe that this commission will realize more money out of this indebtedness than any other tribunal that can be provided.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] such time as he may need in the discussion of this question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman or the Chair a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. POWERS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would like to ask the Chair if I could be recognized in opposition; and if so, for how long a time would I be entitled to the floor—an hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who antagonized the bill, has thirty minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, well, that is satisfactory.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I believe when this matter was last under consideration, the discussion then being had was upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi. That amendment, as I now remember, was a provision requiring a report of the action of the commission to the House of Representatives. I am opposed to that amendment. I do not believe it would be effective of any good result; and I know of no sufficient reason why the matter should not be determined by this commission. This is the same commission that has been in existence heretofore, with an interest much greater than this. The action of that commission met the approval of every man in the country. It resulted in the securement of every dollar claimed by the United States. I know of no reason now why that commission would be less efficient than on the other occasion.

I know if this matter comes back to the House, it will simply be a source of controversy, and there will probably be no decisive action by the House; and if there is, from the very nature of the subject, it will not have been so studied by the House and its membership as will enable them to have ideas correct and proper upon the subject. It is simply a postponement without the possibility of benefit. I have been a member of the Committee on Pacific Railways for many years. I know that the members of this committee study these questions. I know that there are but few of the other members of the House that do. They are intricate. They require time; they require study; they require an effort upon the part of the membership of the House that they have not time to give to them, nor the inclination; and therefore I am opposed to that amendment.

The road is not an important one. It was 101 miles in length. It runs from the city of Sioux City down 40 miles southward to a connection with the Northwestern Road and then goes about 30 miles, and in that way forms a portion of that great railway system. That portion of the track, some 30 miles in length, is important. The other is inconsequential. It is paralleled on both sides by other roads. In the hands of any other corporation than the Northwestern Road it would be of little value. As a part of that system, however, it is able to earn 6 per cent on a valuation of $24,000 a mile. It would not be valuable to any other system that I have any knowledge of.

Now, there are reasons why the people of Sioux City are desirous that this settlement should be made at an early day, and the entire business community of that city has petitioned to Congress for a settlement at once and in the manner provided in this bill. The other reason is that they want an additional connection by another line of this road that gives them a more direct eastern outlet. The Northwestern Road very naturally does not propose to make that connection, to improve to a certain extent this property, until they know who is to have the ownership, they having now but a lease. Therefore I believe the whole delegation from my State approve of this, and all the members of this House, too, from districts contiguous to the line approve of it; I believe it will be absolutely fair; that the United States will get the largest possible sum due to it, and therefore I hope the bill will pass without amendment. It has also been recommended unanimously by the Senate committee corresponding to our own.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] has eight minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has thirty minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I wish to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I think that a bill providing for the settlement of the differences between the Government and this railroad company is wise and proper. I do think, however, that there ought to be an amendment to this bill, and with that amendment the bill would be a much better measure.

This railroad, as I understand it, is not a railroad that is impecunious or bankrupt. I find from the report of the Commissioner of Railroads for 1899 that the net earnings of that road for the year ending June 30, 1899, were $189,771.68; the net earnings for the year ending June 30, 1898, were $167,050.74, and the net earnings of the road for the year ending June 30, 1897, were $94,301.89. These earnings show that the road has gotten into a very prosperous condition and is now yielding a large revenue upon the investment. The $189,771.68 revenue for last year is sufficient to pay annually 3½ per cent upon the entire indebtedness of the road, including the indebtedness to the United States, principal and interest. A road that can show a net earning of 3½ per cent upon the entire indebtedness can not be considered as a bankrupt road, and I believe that the Government, by proper amendment that can be made to this bill, can get out of this railroad company every dollar of the indebtedness due to the Government.

The bill, I have no doubt, was reported by the committee in the utmost good faith. I have no doubt but what they have reported a bill that they thought guarded all the points, but I want to call attention to the fact that there is nothing in this bill that permits competition in the settlement of that indebtedness, and that is the one thing that I think ought to be included, and which is included in the amendment which I shall offer at the proper time.

Mr. SHATTUC. I should like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in the bill that prevents competition?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think there is, impliedly.

Mr. SHATTUC. I wish the gentleman would point it out.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think that the committee intended to cover it, but failed.

Mr. SHATTUC. Does the gentleman think the commission would not take into consideration all of the elements of competition?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know what might be in the minds of the commission.

Mr. SHATTUC. Does not the gentleman think they did pretty well with the other roads?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but you had a clause limiting the commission in making that settlement—that it should not accept a settlement for less than the principal and interest—and it obtained in that settlement principal and interest. But this bill only authorizes the commission to settle with the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company; it does not authorize a settlement or sale of the mortgage; it does not authorize the commission to accept or receive propositions for any other person or corporation; it practically puts the commission at the mercy of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, or of whatever corporation owns and controls the majority of the stock thereof.

Now, I find that running into Sioux City there are four trunk lines, neither of which has a direct line to Omaha, Nebr. They are the Chicago and Northwestern, which company now owns a majority of the stock of the present Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company; the Great Northern Railroad enters Sioux City; the Illinois Central enters the city, and the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul also enters that city. There is no direct route from Sioux City to Omaha except by this line, which the Government holds the mortgage on. It is likely that every one of these railroad companies wants a direct line to Omaha. There are other ways of reaching Omaha, but they are circuitous. This route does not extend all the way to Omaha, but it extends, I think, some 70 miles in that direction, and consequently you can readily see that there are four corporations that ought naturally to compete for this road.

Now, the amendment which I propose, and which I shall offer at the proper time, will make the bill read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General of the United States are hereby authorized and empowered to make settlement and adjustment [with] of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company's [of its] indebtedness to the Government of the United States—

I have inserted "of" instead of "with" and have stricken out "of its" in the next line; and here is what I wish to insert—and to that end may receive and determine upon any proposition from said Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, or from any other person or persons, corporation or corporations, or may sell or assign the mortgage given by said company to the United States and do any and all things proper and necessary to effect such settlement and adjustment and secure to the United States the largest possible sum in the payment of said indebtedness up to the full amount thereof.

I do not see how anyone can object to that amendment. It gives a broader scope to the commission. It permits them to receive bids from any other person or corporation that may want the road; and inasmuch as there are trunk lines that enter Sioux City, and inasmuch as this is the only direct route to Omaha, it seems to me that there should be four competitors for that road. These four competitors would naturally bring the price to be received by the Government to the highest amount obtainable.

I will show why, under this bill, the commissioners could not take into consideration the propositions of any other company. The bill reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General of the United States are hereby authorized and empowered to make settlement and adjustment with the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company of its indebtedness to the United States.

It will be seen that under this provision this commission is to make settlement with that company. It does not leave the commission open to receive bids from any other company or person who might be interested and might want to become a purchaser of that railroad. The amendment will open the field, will give broader scope to the commission, will permit them to receive bids, will permit them to sell the mortgage of the Government, and under this broad authority the commissioners may get out of this railroad the highest amount which the Government could possibly receive under the circumstances.

This road consists of a north and south line from Sioux City to California Junction, and there it branches westward. The part of the road which lies in Iowa consists of 70 miles north and south and 10 miles going westward to the bridge across the Missouri River. The report of the State railroad commissioner of Iowa says that the earnings of this company per mile in Iowa, where all the north and south part of the road is located, amount to $5,008.36 net per mile. That is the revenue for last year. It further says that of the roads existing in Iowa this road ranks eighth in point of net revenue per mile; in other words, there are only 7 roads in Iowa that yield greater returns per mile for the operation of their roads in that State than this part of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad. It will thus be seen that this is not an insolvent road.

Mr. SHATTUC. Would not those figures be accessible to the gentlemen of the commission? Is it not to be assumed that they will take into consideration all such matters?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think they will try to get at all the facts; but my objection is, that this bill seems to permit a settlement with this road only. The language, as I have already quoted it, is that the commissioners "are hereby authorized and empowered to make settlement and adjustment with the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company of its indebtedness to the United States;" whereas the amendment which I advocate will permit a settlement not only with the Sioux City and Pacific road, but with any other company or person that may want to compete for the ownership of the same.

Mr. SHATTUC. It is not mandatory that the commissioners should make settlement with this road only.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no, it is not; but if the act of Congress tells the commissioners that they are authorized to make settlement with this company, and if they are not expressly authorized to receive bids from anyone else, the result would naturally be that if the commissioners deemed it advisable to dispose of the property to some other company they would have to come to Congress for new legislation, which would involve delay. Under these circumstances the commissioners might feel disposed to take a much less sum than if they were permitted to close a settlement with anybody who might want to buy the road.

Mr. SHATTUC. Has the gentleman any idea that the commissioners would take less from the Chicago and Northwestern road than from any other line?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman from Colorado will send up his amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The chairman of the committee says that he will accept this amendment. With the amendment the bill will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

The Clerk read the bill as proposed to be amended by Mr. SHAFROTH, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General of the United States are hereby authorized and empowered to make settlement and adjustment of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company's indebtedness to the Government of the United States; and to that end may receive and determine upon any proposition or propositions from said Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company or from any other person or persons, corporation or corporations, and may sell or assign the mortgage given by said company to the United States and do any and all things proper and necessary to effect such settlement and adjustment, and secure to the United States the largest sum possible in the payment of said indebtedness up to the full amount thereof: Provided, That they deem the same for the best interests of the Government; and when such settlement is approved by the President it shall become operative, and the Attorney-General shall make the necessary acquittances to said railroad company.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, when we had this Pacific Railroad bill up before, the same policy was assumed in this House as at present. The fact is, the committee ran down our property; they seemed to think it was of little value and tried to push through bills here which would force a settlement out of which the Government would get practically nothing. We happened to have in this House at that time, as a Representative, Mr. HARRIS, of Kansas, now a Senator. He was a civil engineer by profession, and he had helped build the different lines of this road, had accepted much of it, and knew its whole history. When he took the floor the time for debate was very much limited, but by unanimous consent the limitation was removed, and he held the floor by the hour. His advice was taken. Now, when we had this matter up before, I was referring to that gentleman and to his work in securing a settlement that surprised us all. After our former controversy over this bill I dropped him a note and received a reply which I would like to have read in my time.

Mr. POWERS. That is not regular.

Mr. BELL. Why not?

Mr. POWERS. This is from a Senator.

Mr. BELL. I will read it myself. I ask the page to bring back the letter, if the gentleman from Vermont is going to object. He seems to be afraid of information.

Mr. POWERS. I am not afraid of information, but I submit——

Mr. BELL. Bring the letter back. I do not want my time consumed.

Mr. POWERS. I submit it is not in order to put into the proceedings of the House a statement by a gentleman who is a member of the Senate. He can express his views in the Senate.

Mr. BELL. But I have asked to have this read as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman to have withdrawn the article.

Mr. BELL. I asked, Mr. Speaker, and I now ask, to have it read in my time from the desk. It is a letter from a Senator, and is an expression of his individual views upon the question presented by this bill.

Mr. POWERS. And I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he may only make his argument in the other body. He is a member of the Senate and may present his views there. He should not submit them to the members of the House to influence legislation here.

Mr. BELL. Senator HARRIS shows in this letter some facts which are important. It is not his action in the Senate, but simply his private views.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would have to examine the article itself in order to form an idea as to whether it would be admissible under the point of order made by the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. BELL. I will read it myself as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman proceeding to quote from the Senator in open Senate?

Mr. BELL. No, Mr. Speaker; I am quoting from a letter from Senator HARRIS addressed to myself personally.

The SPEAKER. But the point of order is made against the reading of the article in the House.

Mr. BELL. Under a misapprehension, I think. This is a private letter—a personal matter, addressed to myself. It is not the action of Senator HARRIS in the Senate, and has no connection with his action as a Senator. It is a personal letter to myself. I asked him for some information upon this question, and he responded in this personal letter to me which I propose to read.

The SPEAKER. Does this purport to be a speech from the Senator in open Senate?

Mr. BELL. Oh, no; only his individual views on a question relating to the settlement of this controversy, addressed to myself in response to an inquiry. It has nothing to do with the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed, on his statement that this language was not uttered in the Senate.

Mr. BELL. I hope this interruption does not come out of my time.

Senator HARRIS says:

In this whole matter from the beginning we have had the singular spectacle of officers and representatives of the Government holding the claim against property, having the apparently determined effort to depreciate its value and to accept only the valuation put upon it by the very parties most interested in undervaluation. In the Union Pacific and Central Pacific the facts ultimately worked out to show the absolute folly of this position.

Now, I wish to show you exactly what this means. Senator HARRIS insisted that this was not the proper way to deal with the matter; that the bill under consideration ought to be amended, for the report of these officers comes back to Congress, the power from which it emanates; and because if we have this bill to be approved by the President, he, in the multifarious duties of his office, can not possibly look personally into the question for himself, but must get his information from the Attorney-General, who is a member of the commission itself, and is equivalent to having no approval of it at all on the part of the Executive. Now, we know that the President has not the time to get at the bottom facts in a case of this kind. He must take the advice of his subordinates. The Attorney-General is a member of the commission, and therefore the report should be approved by Congress, from which their power originated.

Senator HARRIS continues:

And the same thing would have been true on the Kansas Pacific. * * * I inclose you a report which I made last year on this subject, by which it is clearly shown that the average net receipts for four dull years—1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896—on the 100 miles of road was over $129,000. This is taken from the reports of the railroad commissions, and is absolutely net earnings. This certainly shows that the 100 miles might be valued at $3,500,000 or $4,000,000, and would certainly justify the payment at least to the Government of the face value of the bonds ($1,600,000).

But this road has a valuable bridge across the Missouri River—

And I wish to call your special attention to this point—

But this road has a valuable bridge across the Missouri River, and if you will examine the original acts you will find in all cases Congress required the construction of a continuous line of road; and in the Omaha Bridge case, where the company attempted to have the bridge released from the Government lien, the Supreme Court decided that the continuous line of road from the initial point to the terminus must include the bridge, and decided that the bridge was subject to the Government lien. This case is in no way different except that the railroad company was authorized to permit a separate corporation, which was one and the same thing under another name, to construct the bridge, and it is an absurdity to suppose that the Government ever contemplated the construction of two detached pieces of road with a bridge of another corporation separating and disconnecting the two pieces.

I think this is a point upon which we should have a decision of the Supreme Court. * * * If this bridge is, as I believe it is, covered by the Government lien, there is no question but what we should have the whole amount of the Government indebtedness, $4,200,000. If it is not, we ought to get the face value of the bonds. I think by all means the amount which the commission should accept should be specified, as was the case in the Central Pacific—

Now, we specified the amount that must be received in all former bills—

where the commission was absolutely required to obtain the whole amount of the debt due the United States, and was limited to ten years with semi-annual payments, with 3 per cent interest, as the terms upon which it should be paid. You will find that we added this requirement to the commission bill, and it was on the general deficiency bill of June 30, 1898, page 8. * * *

Now, that bill passed through this House with the committee itself depreciating this property and saying that it was of no value to the Government of the United States; but the Senate put on the bill a provision, and insisted that we must have the amount of the debt or there could be no settlement, and they walked right up and paid the bill.

The Union Pacific was settled, as you remember, through the courts by invoking public sentiment to compel the Attorney-General to either accept full payment or obtain a postponement until Congress could act.

If you remember, there was a great cry by the newspapers from New York and everywhere that this property was going to be sacrificed, and forced a settlement.

Either one of two things should be insisted upon—the full amount should be obtained or the settlement referred back to Congress for approval.

Now, we thought that amendment ought to go in. If they get the full amount of our claim, let them settle. If they do not get the full amount of the claim, let them send it back to us, from whom they got their authority, for our approval or disapproval.

Of course I need not comment on that part of the House report which speaks of the debt as a payment of principal and accrued interest, when, in fact, the interest was advanced by the Government owing to the default of the company, and the interest is as much a part of the principal debt as the face of the bonds.

The interest mentioned here is interest that we paid on the bonds.

The report of the Chicago and Northwestern Railway Company to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the year ending June 30, 1896, shows that the dividends for that year on the bridge amounted to $1,486,000. Other years were much less, but we understand how unreliable railroad reports are, but in this case they seem to have been forced to acknowledge the tremendous income derived from the bridge.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which I have offered and which is pending is a very simple one. It is to require the commission appointed by this bill to report back to Congress the settlement at which it shall arrive, for the approval or the disapproval of that body.

In the discussion of the question when it was up here before, some little difference of opinion arose between me and the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], which grew out of the assertion on the part of one of them that what was wanted in this bill was to settle the debt by a commission, "in the same way in which the debts of the other land-grant aided roads had been settled." I then said that my recollection was that this was not at all the same settlement; but concluding that they had been more familiar with the details of Pacific Railroad legislation than I, I was disposed to concede that they were right and I probably wrong.

I have looked into the matter since that time, however, and I find that I was right. The Union Pacific debt was settled in the course of court proceedings, after there was an attempt made to foreclose. No commission had anything in the world to do with the settlement of the Union Pacific debt. And yet, without a commission, we procured from that railroad every dollar which they owed the Government of the United States, except, I believe, upon the Kansas Pacific branch, where we got a compromise. On the balance we got the principal of the debt and the interest, treated as interest, not upon the theory of treating our payment of their interest on their bonds as principal, as might, perhaps, have been done theoretically.

Now, I find this, Mr. Speaker, that when we came to settle the Central Pacific and the Western Pacific we inserted this language in the act which created the commission for the settlement of our claim:

That said commission shall not agree to accept a less sum in settlement of the amount due to the United States than the full amount of principal and interest, and all amounts necessary to reimburse the United States for moneys paid for interest or otherwise.

Now, I would have offered that amendment to this bill but for the fact that I did not feel assured in my own mind that that would be right and proper in this particular case. I do not know enough about it to know whether it is possible to get the full principal and interest.

But I do want this commission to get all it can get, and I read this to show that you are not bringing to this House a bill on all fours with the previous legislation creating commissions for the settlement of the Pacific Railroad debts. The act in case of Central Pacific and Western Pacific railroads also had another proviso:

Provided further, That unless the settlement herein authorized be perfected within one year after the passage of this act, the President of the United States shall at once proceed to foreclose all liens now held by the United States against said railroad companies and to collect the indebtedness herein sought to be settled, and nothing in this act contained shall be held to waive, etc.

In other words, you not only provided there that the commission should not accept a dollar less than the principal and interest, but provided that if they did not settle in one year the President should proceed in a court procedure to foreclose; and it was not until they were ready to put the spurs of the law into their flanks that they did settle, and then they settled by giving us everything which was due. Now, gentlemen will remember when the settlement of these other railroad debts was up for discussion—and in the case of the Union Pacific we did not appoint a commission—that the best-informed men of this House said it was altogether absurd to think of getting the value of the debt of these roads. They said that the part subject to our liens had not any termini, that they could not go into San Francisco, could not cross the Omaha bridge, and that we could not get anything.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me right there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In line with what the gentleman from Mississippi suggests, I wish by way of corroboration to say that I was on the Committee on Pacific Railroads in the Fifty-third Congress when the settlement of this commission came up. Those who advocated what may be termed the railroad interests said just what the gentleman from Mississippi has stated—that the Government of the United States would never recover anything, some ready debaters stating that at the end of a hundred years' litigation the Government of the United States might possibly recover $10,000,000, but the majority of them thought nothing at all, no matter how protracted the litigation. I was on the minority.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is true. They said that the first mortgage would take up the whole railroad.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And they proved it by the figures.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And they proved it by the figures. That is a sort of excuse for using some figures in connection with this road, and I quote from a minority report signed by Senators MORGAN, RAWLINS, HARRIS, in the Senate of the United States. I find that the net earnings for the years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896 of this line were:

1893	$132,845.73
1894	157,247.71
1895	120,542.61
1896	106,764.93
Total for four years	517,400.98
Average for four years	129,350.24

The average of the net earnings for the last four years, amounting to the sum of $129,350.24, we believe indicates clearly that the value of the property on a basis of 4 per cent is considerably in excess of the sum of $3,000,000.

What is the debt? They owe us, of principal, $1,628,320; interest, $2,612,388, making a total of $4,240,708.

Now, I understand there is a tacit understanding or agreement, or rather a coming together of minds, to the effect that $1,000,000 would be a satisfactory settlement with these people.

I do not think so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in addition to that, I want to call attention to the matter of this bridge, which was mentioned by the gentleman from Colorado. Here is a bridge that was built under a charter granted to the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad. I am informed that the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad, the president of which, I understand, is also the president of this road, has reported that this bridge earned in the year ending June 30 $1,400,000.

Now, they contend that the Government can not foreclose on the bridge; that the Government has no lien on it. They made that contention in the case of the Omaha bridge on the Union Pacific, and in 91 United States Supreme Court Reports that case was decided, and the court decided that the Government could fasten its lien upon that bridge; and upon what reasoning? For the reason that the act provided that the corporation was to build "a continuous line of road," and they could not be heard to say that the Omaha bridge they traveled over was not a part of their road, since it had to be in order to be "a continuous road."

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will see that this bridge is not a part of the road.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; a part of the railroad who built the bridge, in effect, by assignment of the charter rights.

Mr. HEPBURN. Who does the gentleman give as authority for the statement that they were to build a continuous line of road?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The charter which enabled them to use the money, as I understand, was to build a continuous line of road between certain termini. I think that is the case with all the Pacific aided roads; that the charters used that language.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not built upon the line contemplated in the charter. It was a diversion.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that.

Mr. HEPBURN. After legislation; and it is not connected in any way at its southern terminus with the Pacific Railroad, except as another company—not the Pacific Railroad—built a portion. It is not connected with the Pacific system.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Congress of the United States granted a charter for the construction of the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad, and later a charter to erect this bridge. It also granted in that charter, in which the grantees were the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad, a right to the railroad to assign that charter, and the contention is that they had the right to assign it so as to take the bridge, when built by the assignees, out from under the lien of the United States. Then our contention is that, notwithstanding the right of assignment, the assignment must be subject to the equities of the United States as shown to exist in the railroad charter and in the bridge charter.

Mr. POWERS. Now, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi is partly right and partly wrong. The Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company had a charter granted by the Iowa legislature, and authorized the building from Sioux City to a connection with the Union Pacific, and it could only be done by building across this river to some point in Nebraska, and then Congress, as the gentleman states, afterwards authorized it to build this bridge.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; Congress afterwards came to its aid, passed a bill in aid of the construction of a railway, with bonds, lands, etc., and in the act they provided that they should build a continuous line of railway between certain points. In connection with the bridge, the grantee in the charter to erect the bridge was the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, and the only ground upon which they claim exemption is that in the same charter they were granted the right to assign the bridge charter, and they claim that the right to assign the power to construct the bridge carried with it an exemption of the bridge from the claims of the United States Government. Now, we deny that. The Omaha Bridge case was not exactly on all fours with this, but in many respects similar to it, and the United States Supreme Court decided that case in favor of the Government and against the railroad.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Has the time of the gentleman from Mississippi fully expired, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It has; and one minute more.

Mr. POWERS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, do I understand the amendment that I have offered has been accepted by the committee.

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the House wants a settlement and an adjustment with the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, that the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado clearly protects the Government, and ought to be adopted. It gives to the commission, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Attorney-General all the competition that possibly can be had in negotiating a settlement. Now, the only question is, Do we want a settlement; do we want the matter adjusted? And if so, the amendment of the gentleman ought to be accepted. I have grave doubts about the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that the report of the commission should come back to the House.

There is no telling when that would be ended or concluded. If you have any confidence in the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of the Treasury, guarded as it is by the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, you had better let them have the full power to close up the bids under these restrictions and with these privileges. If it comes back here, the party with whom they negotiate will feel as though it never may be concluded. It may be in a year, and it may be in five years, and perhaps it will not be accepted at all; or it may be slightly amended and sent back and kept traveling backward and forward for many years. No party or parties would like to be held down to a settlement thus handicapped.

Mr. TERRY. Why should we give this commission more power in this case than we have ever done in any similar case?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think the gentleman from Arkansas did not listen to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado or he would not have asked that question.

Mr. TERRY. I not only listened to it carefully, but I asked the gentleman about it afterwards. It does not say that they shall get the full amount of the debt——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I know it does not. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] covered that in his suggestion that perhaps it would be unwise to limit the commission in that respect.

Mr. TERRY. And there is no provision in the gentleman's amendment that the commission shall report back to Congress, and you are against that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am arguing against its coming back to Congress, because if you instruct the commission as is provided in the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, there is no good reason, in my humble opinion, in making them report back to Congress to have a wrangle over it for months and years, and perhaps afterwards defeat the whole negotiation by reference to Congress.

Mr. TERRY. But this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time to the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman declines to yield to me for a further question?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No.

Mr. TERRY. Well, I call attention to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado does not limit this commission as to the amount for which they shall settle; they can take one-half of the debt due the Government; and then it does not provide that they shall report back to Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They are limited in that respect, and the reason is the House is not clearly settled in its mind as to what can be done or ought to be done.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman think that, if the proposed settlement is reported back to Congress, together with the data upon which they base their conclusions, Congress will be in possession of sufficient information to better judge of it?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Perhaps they would.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. For that reason I want it to come back.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; and then comes the question whether we want a settlement or not. Now, Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has three and one-half minutes.

Mr. POWERS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. THOMAS] who introduced this bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the general provisions of this bill and the necessity for its passage have, I think, been pretty fully discussed by a number of gentlemen who have preceded me. I shall direct my remarks entirely to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

I believe it to be wholly impracticable to attempt to create this commission and then hedge them about with a limitation as provided for by this amendment. The indebtedness against this road is now about $58,000 per mile, or a little less than that. Now, it is evident that this railroad could be paralleled for very much less. With the information before the House we are not in a position at the present time to attempt to place such limitation upon this commission. We might just as well authorize the commission to receive bids for the settlement with this road, and to authorize it to confer with the several railroad companies that might feel inclined to bid, and then report to the House the best bid offered.

It amounts to nothing more than authorizing the commission to receive bids, without any authority or power whatever to negotiate with any of the companies upon a plan of settlement. The bill as it now stands, without the amendment, gives to the commission power, with the approval of the President, to confer with the several railroad companies that may desire to obtain control of the road and settle the indebtedness to the Government on the best terms obtainable. And with the experience before us of the settlement of the claims of the Government against the other Pacific railroads, I feel assured that we make no mistake in investing this commission with full power to make settlement of the Government's claim, subject to the approval of the President.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the proposition of this bill, as it now stands with the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, is practically the same proposition that was adopted in the case of the Central Pacific Railroad, with the exception that in that case the commission was directed to require full payment of the indebtedness. Now, here is a case about which there is a great deal of question whether we can secure the full indebtedness. But we refer the matter to this independent tribunal who have possession of all the papers in the Department and who have experts at their command who can investigate the whole matter and do precisely as we directed the commissioners to do in the case of the Central Pacific.

In that case we adopted a settlement without any reference back to Congress; and if this proposition had been put upon that bill, it never would have passed this House. The House would then have said, as I expect it will say now, that if Congress is to settle the question it might as well settle it now, without going through the farce of referring it to a jury for determination and then requiring the jury to refer it back to us for our decision. Now, if there is nothing further to be said, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments may be read.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 8, after the word "States," insert the words "Provided, That they deem the same for the best interests of the Government."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 10, strike out the word "President" and insert "the Congress of the United States."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 67, noes 69.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I call for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 93, nays 109, answered "present" 12, not voting 133; as follows:

YEAS—93.

Mr. DOVENER with Mr. CATCHINGS.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded simply as "present."

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. DRISCOLL, and desire to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. VAN VOORHIS, and withdraw my vote and desire to be recorded as "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, that amendment has been accepted.

The SPEAKER. It is not in the power of the gentleman to accept an amendment when the matter is pending before the House. The vote will be taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment of Mr. SHAFROTH was again reported, and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being read the third time, was passed.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Agriculture to move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion of my colleague from New York, I would like to ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the Indian appropriation bill, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York, that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments to the Indian appropriation bill and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CURTIS, and Mr. LITTLE as conferees on the part of the House.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. O'GRADY in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 10538.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, there are three amendments——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WADSWORTH (continuing). There are three amendments pending to the paragraph in the bill relating to publications of the Department of Agriculture, and I wish to address myself particularly to the one asking an increase in the appropriation of $20,000 in that item.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that I was recognized?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In regard to this proposed increase, I want to repeat what I said last evening. The amount appropriated by the bill is the amount estimated for by the Agricultural Department. It gives 5,000 bulletins to each member, and in the judgment of the Agricultural Department that is all that is necessary for the proper dissemination of useful agricultural information; and, as I said yesterday, whenever there is a bulletin that is particularly interesting to the agricultural industries of a district, the local press take it up and publish it, so that the information goes broadcast all over the country.

Now I want to read a paragraph in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, on page 40, under the head of Farmers' bulletins:

Of the total number of copies of farmers' bulletins printed (2,437,000), Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress took only 1,100,985—considerably less than last year and the year previous.

Now mark—

That shows that Congressmen and Senators and Delegates are not asking for these bulletins as they were in the past.

Under the law, when Senators, Representatives, and Delegates do not avail themselves of the entire number of copies of farmers' bulletins allotted to them, the same revert to the Department for miscellaneous institutions or for satisfying further Congressional orders. I am, therefore, able for the current year to increase the quota of farmers' bulletins allotted to members of Congress from 4,000 to 5,000.

In addition to this the committee have seen fit, on the recommendation of the Secretary to give him $5,000 additional over the current year. This item of $20,000 may be looked upon as a small increase, but I can see no reason why Congress should allow it. This thing was gone over pretty thoroughly yesterday afternoon, but I wanted to call particular attention to what the Secretary of Agriculture says in regard to the demand for bulletins, because that is the point that my friend from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] bore particularly upon.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I make the point of order that debate on this paragraph is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take up the time of the House in the discussion of this proposed amendment increasing the number of bulletins that members may have to send out to their constituents, but I stand here to speak for the people of my district, and I assume that there are other districts with demands similar to mine.

These experimental stations have been established at a great cost to the Government. In this bill we appropriate something like eight or nine hundred thousand dollars to be expended for that purpose. Now, what is the object of that experimental work? Shall it be said that this experimentation shall be carried on and that the people shall know nothing of it? The object of these bulletins is that the people may be informed upon these subjects, and I know of no way in which the money could be so well expended. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to say yesterday that he wanted to send out 35,000 copies to his district, and that he expected only 10 per cent of them to be read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, I did not say that. I said 90 per cent of them would be appreciated.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I was in error, but I understood the gentleman in that way. I see by the RECORD to-day he says that 90 per cent would be read. If 90 per cent of his 35,000 copies that he would like to send to his district would be read, then I say in all justice to the people of his district they should be furnished with those copies.

I was amused yesterday at the colloquy between my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and my other friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] on the cotton seed question. It was proposed to investigate the cotton seed and its products. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] called the attention of his colleague [Mr. SIMS] to the fact that that had already been done, and I find here among these bulletins one upon that subject. I commend that bulletin to the gentleman from Tennessee and to the gentleman from Mississippi, and I think they should give the people of their districts an opportunity to know something of what has been done on this subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. This gentleman has done that. He has sent out about a thousand copies of them to his district.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It seems that results speak louder than words, because, although these copies have been sent out, the people do not seem to be informed on this subject.

Another thing: the gentleman from Mississippi says that when the people want these bulletins they call for them. They are like some members of Congress—they do not know that they are in existence. The farmers can not know that these bulletins are published until they see copies of them, and it is the duty of members of Congress to know what is to be had for the people of their districts, and to furnish the things that they want, and not wait until the people become informed on the subject and then send for the information. If we spend a million dollars for experimentation, I say it is but fair and proper and just that we should spend $30,000 in carrying the results of that experimentation to the people. We have not time to discuss this question to-day as it should be discussed.

It so happens in the natural order of things that the gentleman on the other side, the chairman of this committee [Mr. WADSWORTH], and the gentleman on this side [Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi] have denied the members of this House an opportunity to discuss the amendment that we propose, and all that we can do is to get in a few remarks here under the five-minute rule. Yesterday when we wanted to discuss this, the gentleman said to us that if we wanted to discuss general political issues we could get time to burn, but that if we proposed to advocate any amendment to this bill there would not be one minute of time at our disposal.

Now, I wish, under the five-minute rule, to call attention briefly to the demands of the people on this subject, and I call attention here in these running, rambling remarks, so that you can understand something of this amendment proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. I speak for my district, that has 40,000 voters, 30,000 of whom would read every one of 50 copies of these bulletins, and I do your constituency the credit to believe that they would read them likewise if you sent them there. I believe that is true of every constituency. They want to be informed, and it is but right that this House should give them an opportunity to be informed, by sending the bulletins provided by this Department; and the pittance of $57,000 is a very small amount to be appropriated for this purpose. I was taunted yesterday with demagoguery when I said that agriculture did not receive its proper consideration in this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LATIMER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue for five minutes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, I repeat what I said on yesterday. What I said yesterday I say again to-day, and gentlemen who desire may give the "horselaugh" for the statement if they choose. There is a bill pending here now in this House, and favorably reported, to spend $200,000 to send a commission to China to investigate the conditions there with reference to selling our manufactured goods; and yet of the exports from this country 75 per cent are from the farms. Still we can not have $57,500 in order to make the agriculturists of this country familiar with the work that is carried on at the experimental stations provided at great cost to the taxpayers.

The gentleman from Mississippi assumes that when we send one of these bulletins out we do it for the sinister purpose of getting a vote. I do not know what his motive is when he sends a bulletin to one of his constituents, but when I send one to a constituent of mine I send it out for no such base and ignoble purpose. I send it out not only that my friends may read it, but that they may obtain the best information upon these subjects that lie at the very foundation of this Government. This is the greatest agricultural country in the world, and our people are agriculturists, and he who would withhold from them anything that tends to give them more enlightenment upon their vocation is doing that which is injurious to the very principles of our great Government.

I say, then, Mr. Chairman, that this increase of $20,000, making a total appropriation of $57,000 for the publication of this literature, is too small, entirely too small; but we must do the best we can.

These gentlemen are holding us down with hard hands, and we will have to take just what we can get. But I believe the members of this House will see the justice of our proposed amendment and vote it accordingly.

The farmer is not sitting here asking for anything. He sends his representatives here to do what they think ought to be done in his behalf. To speak in that way is in no sense demagoguery, as was intimated yesterday when a gentleman said that he could make a farmer's speech. The farmer does not come here. He looks to his representative; and I say it is our duty to urge this amendment, and to urge all other similar propositions in his behalf. Now, as the time is up, I must stop. I would like to have had thirty minutes in which to discuss the bill itself, and not to discuss some general political subject that had nothing to do with it. I yield back to the gentleman from South Carolina any time not consumed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have thirty minutes to speak on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has been recognized.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that there is no gentleman upon this floor who represents a better agricultural district than the one which I have the honor to represent, and during my entire Congressional career I have always voted for every measure which in my judgment was in the interest of the agriculturist. The Agricultural Department, now presided over by that distinguished gentleman, Secretary Wilson, was created during my service in this House; and I have seen that Department of the Government, that has now become so great in the distribution of information throughout the country, develop from year to year under appropriations that have been made by the different Congresses since its establishment. I am not, however, in favor of the amendment which is proposed here, which will take $20,000 additional money out of the Treasury of the United States, and the reason that I am not in favor of it is that I believe it would be a waste of the money.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In connection with what has just been said, let me say that a million of these pamphlets last year were unused; Members of Congress and Senators did not call for them.

Mr. HOPKINS. I was about to make the remark when interrupted by the gentleman from Mississippi that the record shows that the Agricultural Committee has in the past, as it has in this bill, made ample provision for these bulletins, so that every intelligent farmer of America could have one if he desired it; and my experience is——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I can not yield. My experience is that many of the farmers do not care for these bulletins, and for that reason we have found that appropriations made in the past have been sufficiently ample. Now, in the last Congress we made appropriation so that two million and three or four hundred thousand copies of these pamphlets were published, and only a million and some odd thousand were called for by members, leaving a million and over two hundred thousand bulletins to be distributed by the Secretary himself. Many of them have not been distributed at all. The appropriation in this bill provides for an increase of $5,000 over previous appropriations, so that instead of having pamphlets to the amount provided for in previous bills this appropriation will provide for 2,500,000 of these pamphlets.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that with the facts here before us no man who is a lover of his country, no man who desires to see the affairs of this Government economically administered, can for a moment insist on taking $20,000 additional money for this purpose.

The Secretary of this great Department is himself a practical farmer. He has as much interest in this great industry, aye, a thousand times more than the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who has just been criticising this committee. The Secretary of Agriculture does not ask for this increased appropriation. In his report he says that the committee has given for this purpose all that can be properly used by the Department. He says in his report to Congress that if $85,000 is granted, that is all the money he wants. Now, why should this House, simply because the gentleman from Missouri or some other gentleman desires an additional number of these bulletins, make an appropriation, when the facts show that it will be impossible to send them all out? If the gentleman exhausts the amount allotted to him, let him go to the Secretary of Agriculture, who has a million and a half extra pamphlets there, and he can get all he wants.

Mr. LATIMER. Does not the gentleman know that that million and a half copies that lapsed last year have been put into the quota allotted to members this year?

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, why should they not?

Mr. LATIMER. And if you go to-day you can not get an allotment of bulletins.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, I disagree entirely with the gentleman.

Mr. LATIMER. I have been there and asked for them.

Mr. HOPKINS. Any gentleman that desires bulletins, or any series of bulletins, can get all he requires, and it is perfectly evident, in my judgment, that for anybody to get a proper number of bulletins it is not necessary to adopt this amendment, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Debate is exhausted on this amendment.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes. I moved the amendment, and I have not occupied much time yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, no man in this House has greater respect for the Secretary of Agriculture than I have. I think every member of this House will agree with me that no man has filled that position since the Department has been organized who has given such universal satisfaction. I went to the Secretary to find out if I could get an additional allotment of bulletins. He said to me that all the bulletins that have been appropriated for have been allotted to Members of Congress and Senators; and if bulletins lapsed last year, it is for the reason that they did not lapse until the 30th of June.

Members had probably gone to their homes. Bulletins were allotted, and those that lapsed are now in the allotment for this year, and divided pro rata among the members of the House and the Senate. I say to members of this House that the Secretary of Agriculture does not object to our having an increase of $20,000 for the publication of these bulletins. It matters not whether he has recommended it to Congress or whether he has advised the committee to make the appropriation or not; that is not the question involved. He did ask you to give $8,000 for the purpose of assisting the Agrostologist in his work, and you refused and only gave him $5,000.

You have not followed the Secretary and his recommendations excepting when they met your will. The publication of these bulletins is a matter of interest to every member of this House. We are spending $780,000 for maintaining experiment stations throughout the country. I want to ask gentlemen of this committee and members of this House, why continue these experiment stations at a cost of $780,000 annually if we refuse to send out the information acquired through these institutions?

It is valuable information which every farmer ought to have; and I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that out of the 200 bulletins which have been printed there are at least 100 that every farmer in your district would like to read, because they deal with subjects of vital interest to him. There is no greater interest in this country than that of agriculture. The gentleman from Missouri stated that about two-thirds of the exports from this country were furnished by the farms; yet the gentleman refused to agree to increase this appropriation so that the valuable information gathered by our experiment stations might be sent out to the farmers of the country, and thereby aid in increasing this export trade and thus adding to our national wealth.

Now, a word with regard to the position taken by the Secretary of Agriculture. He said if we wanted to increase the appropriation for seeds the members of this House have a right to so provide in the bill; that they send out these seeds to the country; that the Secretary of Agriculture gets one-third of the seeds and one-third of the agricultural bulletins, and that is all he cares to send out. But what becomes of the members of the House? What are 5,000 bulletins to Representatives having a constituency of perhaps 20,000 farmers?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question? I think it quite important that these bulletins should be sent out to agricultural districts; but does not the gentleman think that if any member desires to send out to his constituents more than his quota he has friends on both sides of the House who do not need these bulletins for distribution, and who would be very glad to draw them and hand them over to those who do need them?

Mr. LATIMER. I am glad the gentleman has made that point. There are members who represent city districts and who are willing to give their bulletins to those who represent rural districts. But does not the gentleman know that, while only 5,000 bulletins are issued to each member of the House, there are members who have twenty or thirty thousand men in their district who would be glad to receive them; and that the number issued is not one-third enough to go round among the farmers of the country? This valuable information, which is being printed in these bulletins, is not fully distributed to the people, because there are thousands of farmers in our districts who would like to have fifteen or twenty of these bulletins, as they are written on different subjects.

I hope that this amendment appropriating $20,000 for this purpose will be adopted. The result will be that each member will get 10,000 bulletins instead of 5,000. I hope, also, that the Secretary of Agriculture will be allowed to furnish to members who have not enough bulletins to distribute in their agricultural or rural districts the surplus undisposed of on the 31st of March, instead of the 1st of May, as provided in this bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] states that the people in our districts have not asked for these bulletins.

In reply to that I ask the gentleman if he sits here and waits for his constituents to call upon him for every valuable publication intended for their use? And I ask him if that is his idea of a true representative of the people? The people have commissioned us to come here in order that we may look out for their interest in all lines, and if it is true that a million of these bulletins lapsed to the Secretary last year and were not sent out by members to whom they were allotted, it is proof to my mind that they have neglected their duty to their constituents. Many of your constituents are not informed in regard to the number of bulletins you are entitled to——

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman who offered this amendment, and who claims that there are not enough bulletins to go around among the people who desire them, I wish to call the attention of members of this committee to this fact: It is shown by the statistics in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture that under the appropriations we have heretofore made not one-half of the bulletins heretofore published have ever been sent out.

Mr. LATIMER. It is the fault of yourself and other gentlemen if they have not been.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before we make a greater appropriation for this purpose than has ever been made, let us wait until members take these bulletins in the quantity heretofore issued and allotted to them and send them out.

As the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has said, under the bill now being considered by this committee, $5,000 addition is granted over any appropriation heretofore made for these bulletins; in other words, more than 200,000 more bulletins will be published under this bill than have ever heretofore been published. If any member of Congress who exhausts his own quota will apply to the Secretary of Agriculture within the time limited by law, he can get all the bulletins that he desires. It is simply an absurdity to say that an increased appropriation of $20,000 should be granted to procure these bulletins, when the records show that a large number of those already issued are not used or distributed.

Mr. TALBERT. I move to amend by striking out the last two words. I hope that the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. LATIMER] will prevail, because it will be but simple justice to the farmers of our country, who will be benefited by it; and in benefiting the farmers we help all other classes.

Gentlemen take very extraordinary positions in regard to the little pittance asked here. The gentleman who has just taken his seat says that the bulletins now issued are never all of them sent out, because they are never called for by their constituents.

I do not know what the case may be in other districts, but in the district that I have the honor to represent there is a strong demand, an increasing one, for every document issued by the Government, and an increasing interest is being taken in everything that pertains not only to agriculture but in every other department of the Government; and, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in the district I have the honor to represent I have sent out year after year every bulletin that has been given to me by the Secretary of Agriculture, and after I have sent those out I have had demands upon top of demands for bulletins of various kinds and have been unable to furnish as many of them to my constituents as I would like to have done. I have gone to the Department to see what there was there for my constituents, and in justice to the Commissioner I will say that I have been kindly treated. I am astonished to hear gentlemen on this floor get up and say they have no demand for these bulletins. Maybe it is because their constituents do not know that they are there for them. Then, why not inform them of these things?

Gentlemen, what were you sent here for if not to find out the things that your people want and send them to them? It is your duty to look into every Department and see what is there for your people and then send it out to them without waiting to be called upon by them.

I represent an agricultural district—a district of farmers as pure and patriotic as ever lived—who would be glad to get information upon all of these subjects. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is generally right, has intimated, or at least his language might be construed to mean, that in the South we raise nothing but cotton, and consequently we want nothing for our constituents except treatises upon how to raise cotton. Now, I know the gentleman did not mean any such thing as that.

I will say to the gentleman that in my district, at least, and I think that is the case generally throughout the country from which I come and from whence he came, that we raise many other things besides cotton. We have been driven to this, because to raise cotton exclusively would starve us. We raise cattle and hogs, horses and mules, sheep and goats, and fowls of all kinds; we pay attention to beet culture, we pay attention to bee culture, we have dairy farms and dairy interests, and we want to get the latest information on all these subjects from the Agricultural Department in all of these various branches relating to the farmer's life—and these bulletins are a godsend to them in this way, and we want more of them published to be scattered broadcast over the land to give aid to the farmer in his calling.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me. I know the gentleman from South Carolina is, in my opinion, the last man to do injustice to anybody, and especially to myself.

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly I would not do an injustice if I knew it, for I have very great respect for my friend.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And therefore I can not understand exactly how the gentleman should entertain the opinion that I have given utterance to the expression that we raise nothing in our country but cotton. I said nothing to that effect.

Mr. TALBERT. I only said that the position assumed by the gentleman might be so construed, and I want to say that the gentleman did not mean that, and I was showing that that was an improper construction of his language. I know the farmers have no better friend than he is upon this floor, and whatever position the gentleman may take I believe him to be honest in it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the farmers do not ask very much of this country. They have not been in the habit of doing so in the past. They trust to themselves and their Representatives, and while others, associations of capitalists and the trusts, have their lobbyists here at the doors of Congress, the farmers remain at home and attend to their work and only ask of their Representatives here to comply with the promises made to them upon the stump preceding the election.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is entirely too far off from Christmas for Santa Claus to appear on the scene. I can not yield to my friend from Ohio except in Christmas times. [Laughter.]

I want to say that the questionable methods employed by the trusts and the combines, the whittling process of speculation, the sharp and questionable practices of trade and exchange, the grinding methods that are employed in many avenues of trade and commerce, and the chameleon deals of the law tampering with right and justice with the facile ease of the acrobat find no place in the life or vocabulary of the farmer. He is plain and unsophisticated. He is the only one who has no protection, or at least but little protection, at the hands of the Government. He spends his life in the hot sunshine, with all of the conditions of climate, with rain and drought to oppose him, and it does seem to me while you appropriate millions of dollars every year for others that something at least should be done for him in the line of the suggestion of my colleague from South Carolina.

Why, Mr. Chairman, you even give the Indians three times as much as you give to the farmers. You give to the Indians in this very Congress by your appropriation bill some nine millions of dollars, and you give to the farmers less than $4,000,000 in this bill. They are the people who make it possible for the rest of you to enjoy life. By their labor they feed and clothe the world and make it possible to clothe and feed themselves, although it is sometimes a very hard task, and many of them are almost compelled to go naked and without shoes in order to keep the little farm going. Now, they ask this little trifling pittance at your hands. It is true that the committee has been more liberal than usual. They have doubled, for instance, the seed which are to be distributed, and this is most satisfactory to the farmers, as some of them only know the Government as they get a few seeds.

My distinguished friend over here, in the course of his discussion, said or intimated that the farmer had no time to read. There was a time, Mr. Chairman, I admit, when the farmer sat around with mouth open like a mocking bird, waiting for any pebble that might be thrown into it. [Laughter.] They listened then to the language and the promises of the demagogues. But they are reading for themselves now. They have found out some things, and they are learning a good many others, and we want to recognize them in some little way other than by the assessor and tax collector. That is all I desired to say at present in advocacy of the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say simply a word upon the pending proposition. I have listened to the remarks of gentlemen, and the expressions of sympathy they have given utterance to here as to the farmers of the country. But in view of the fact shown, that the bulletins for which this appropriation is to be made are not exhausted, the reasoning which gentlemen bring in support of their proposition is fallacious.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They can get them as long as the supply is not exhausted.

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. But my point is this: In every State——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. In a moment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. But just in that connection. Do you not know, sir, that members of Congress who have applied to the Department for bulletins have been told that they can not be supplied, that they are not printed, and that there is no appropriation available for printing them?

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. I do not believe that a request for a bulletin, coming from a member of Congress, has been denied.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I have been unable to get them.

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas (continuing). I do not believe that the bulletins can not be procured if proper efforts are made.

But the point I was going to make, Mr. Chairman, is that some $15,000 is appropriated to each and every State for experimental agricultural stations, and these stations are sending out their reports all over the country. They are compiled in the report of the Department of Agriculture, but are first sent out by the agricultural experimental stations, and the $15,000 appropriated to each State is used in this way.

So I say that the experience of the committee and the experience of the Department of Agriculture is against this increase. Gentleman say it is a pittance. Yes; but a great many little pittances make up a large sum. It has been the purpose of the Committee on Agriculture to keep this appropriation within reasonable bounds. They have labored industriously and honestly to bring in a liberal and just bill that would meet the demands of the people of this country, and we believe we have done it.

If we were to listen to all the officials who come before our committee, and were to act upon all that they said with reference to the extreme utility of their Departments to the country, we could appropriate $25,000,000 here in the agricultural appropriation bill. Gentlemen, I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] stated the farmers are sitting at home "dumb as oysters." That accounts for some of the representation on this floor. [Laughter.] The gentleman may speak for the farmers of his district, but not for the farmers of my district. If the gentleman would only have allowed me, when he said that the farmers of his district were suddenly coming to their senses and were about to expurgate the demagogues, I was about to bid the gentleman a fond and affectionate farewell [laughter], but he would not allow me to do it.

Mr. TALBERT. The gentleman had better look out for himself. The gentleman from South Carolina is all right, and he is looking out for his people.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, the gentleman may be all right as long as the farmers sit at home as "dumb as oysters."

Mr. TALBERT. I should like to ask the gentleman why it is that the Republicans of Ohio will not let you be governor? You have been trying to be long enough.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman is inclined to be personal. I never was a candidate for governor and never considered the subject in my life.

Mr. TALBERT. They would not let you be.

Mr. GROSVENOR. How do you know?

Mr. TALBERT. They would not even let you be a candidate, much less elect you.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, well, the gentleman's constituents doubtless are as "dumb as oysters."

Mr. TALBERT. I mean that they have no lobbyist here as other professions have.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, Mr. Chairman, the farmers' bulletins are very valuable, and if the gentleman himself wants any I can give him several thousand that I find myself unable to dispose of. I have sent them wherever called for, and I have an agricultural district. The people there are not as "dumb as oysters," and I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina that a very large majority of them can read and write. I will give the gentleman several thousand copies of these bulletins rather than have them pile up in an accumulation here that nobody wants.

Mr. LATIMER. I want to ask the gentleman what right he has to give those bulletins away?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, well, I do not know that I have any; but they are published for the benefit of the people who want them.

Mr. LATIMER. For the farmers of your district.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would give my friend from Missouri a hundred agricultural reports if I thought that they would do more good in his district than they would in mine.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will take them. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no need of any reports in a district which my friend CLARK of Missouri represents. It does not need anything but his own intelligence to enlighten that district. I am opposed to this amendment, because I do not believe that the farmers of the country want this additional appropriation.

Mr. LATIMER. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that all debate on this paragraph be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that debate on this paragraph be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask for a vote on the first amendment, which is the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina, increasing the appropriation $20,000.

Mr. DALZELL. Let us have the amendment reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to have that amendment divided up. There are some parts of it that some of us may desire to vote for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I propose to ask for a separate vote on each amendment. I have no objection to the other amendments. They are not material.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 6, strike out the word "eighty" and insert the words "one hundred and," so that instead of reading "$85,000" it will read "$105,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LATIMER. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 76, noes 61.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a sufficient number. Tellers are ordered; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] will act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 25, line 7, strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

Mr. WADSWORTH. One moment. What is that amendment?

Mr. LATIMER. Making the language conform.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask to have that reported again.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is all right, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment again.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, strike out the words "two-thirds" and insert the words "four-fifths."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 26, line 1, strike out the word "June" and insert the word "March."

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. LATIMER. Division.

Mr. BARTLETT. I make the point of order that the division was called for too late. The Chair had announced the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had not announced the result before the division was called for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 42.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 15, page 26, strike out "eighty" and insert "one hundred and;" so as to read "$150,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS.

For the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere; transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $170,000, of which amount not more than $22,000 shall be expended for labor in the city of Washington, D. C.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment; and pending the consideration of the amendment, I desire to reserve the point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment which the Clerk will report, and pending the consideration of the amendment, the gentleman reserves the point of order on the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "seed," in line 18, page 26, the words "dinner pails for the laboring people."

[Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. How can the gentleman offer an amendment and also reserve the point of order against it?

Mr. CORLISS. I do not reserve the point of order against the amendment, but against the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I find upon investigation that the law authorizing this appropriation to be made for the distribution of seed expressly provides that the purchase of seeds shall be confined to seeds rare and uncommon to the country. Instead of complying with that provision, the Secretary of Agriculture has from time to time purchased all kinds of common seeds, such as cabbage seeds, turnip, and other common seeds, for distribution, until the appropriation has become very much abused in the distribution and in the purchase of seeds. Why, you discover with proper care not to exceed 10 per cent of all the seeds purchased and distributed are sufficiently valuable to grow; and I think that the result and the practice under this paragraph is simply to benefit the seed trust that every year seeks to dispose of its accumulated worthless seed and have them distributed gratuitously by members of Congress to their constituents.

It is a waste of public money. Mr. Chairman, it is an infringement of the rights of our citizens. In every city, in every little hamlet of our country, you will find grocery men who derive some revenue from the sale of seed, and it is an infringement of their rights. I have offered this amendment, and will offer another one in a few moments upon this paragraph, in good faith. There are in this country two citizens that obtain their living by the sweat of their brow to one who acquires his living by tilling the soil. You are appropriating for a special class; you are giving them a special benefit. My amendment asks that dinner pails shall be furnished to the laboring men. I represent a city that has probably 25,000 laboring men in it and not to exceed 1,000 farmers who cultivate the soil within my district, outside of a little garden. Why should you appropriate for the benefit of your constituents $175,000 for cabbage seeds and not give the laboring men in my district a dinner pail?

Mr. McRAE. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not also represent D. M. Ferry & Co.?

Mr. CORLISS. I represent all the people that live within my district, but I do not want the Secretary of Agriculture to go into D. M. Ferry's establishment and buy worthless seeds that they want to sell and give them to the farmers, when not a dozen of them will come up.

Mr. McRAE. Do you mean to say that this Administration does that?

Mr. CORLISS. I mean to say that 10 per cent of all the seeds distributed by the Agricultural Department are common seeds and valueless seeds that do not grow, and you can not prove to the contrary.

Mr. McRAE. I can prove to the contrary.

Mr. CORLISS. Now, what is the law under which you are misappropriating this money? The law says that you shall confine your appropriations to such seeds as are rare and uncommon. Is it cabbages, turnips, and cucumbers, and some corn that you may buy in Indiana? Are they uncommon and rare?

Mr. STEELE. If you buy Indiana corn, it is rare in quality. [Laughter.]

Mr. CORLISS. It rarely grows anywhere outside of Indiana.

Mr. STEELE. It will grow anywhere, but we will not agree to buy rare dinner buckets for people who do not want them.

Mr. CORLISS. If it grows anywhere outside of Indiana, it runs to stalk and does not make corn.

Mr. SHATTUC. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes.

Mr. SHATTUC. Will you amend that by making it one of Mr. Atkinson's dinner pails? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Michigan may continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the gentleman from Michigan may continue for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. He made the statement that 10 per cent only of these garden seeds grow. I am informed that they are all tested by the Department of Agriculture, and that the best seeds in the world are bought and distributed, and that is my experience. I believe he has made an unwarranted attack on the Department, and I think also an unwarranted attack on his constituent, D. M. Ferry & Co.

Mr. CORLISS. I am making no attack on the Department.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The gentleman read from the Revised Statutes the law relating to the distribution of seeds. Now, I sympathize with the gentleman in his position, but I call his attention to the fact that two years ago we amended that law, I am sorry to say, so as to permit the distribution of seeds which are not rare and valuable.

Mr. CORLISS. I would like to have the gentleman point it out.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. The amendment was on a general appropriation bill, and offered, I think, by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE].

Mr. CORLISS. Making it within the power of the Secretary——

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. To buy any kind of seeds and distribute them anywhere.

Mr. CORLISS. I regret that Congress will go on in that way. You are authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to do business, to go into the jobbing business of seeds.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That is correct.

Mr. STEELE. That is where the pinch comes.

Mr. CORLISS (continuing). I submit that it is wrong. I do not care whether I represent a municipal district or an agricultural district; it is wrong. When you attempt to appropriate money from the Treasury that belongs to the people, give it to one class and deny another the same privilege, you are violating your oaths as members of this House.

If you authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to distribute rare and uncommon seeds for the benefit of the farmer, I will vote with you; but I submit that if you are going to buy common seeds that are known throughout the world to everybody, that can be bought from every corner grocery, then I submit that you should stop. I have offered this amendment because Congress is pursuing a course that is wrong; and if you are bound to give to the farmer one advantage, I ask for the laborer an opportunity to take his dinner pail with him to his place of work every day. I shall offer, Mr. Chairman, an amendment to this paragraph limiting it back to the original law, providing that none but rare and uncommon seeds shall be purchased, if you vote this present amendment down.

Mr. HOPKINS. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Secretary of Agriculture has not in every instance exercised his discretion and sought to get rare varieties of seed, and has done the best he could to distribute them over the country for the benefit of all the people?

Mr. CORLISS. I believe that the Secretary of Agriculture has exercised great care in buying the best seeds he can buy, and has carried out the law as it has been enacted by Congress; but I want to say to you that it is impossible for the Secretary of Agriculture to buy in this country the quantity of seeds that you compel him to buy unless he buys them of the seed trust, and they have——

Mr. HOPKINS. One moment——

Mr. CORLISS (continuing). In their hands a large quantity of seed they desire to impose upon the farmer through the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the gentleman will allow me, the Secretary has provided against that.

Mr. CORLISS. How?

Mr. HOPKINS. There was some complaint during the last Democratic Administration that the Secretary of Agriculture had been imposed upon in this respect, and the present Secretary has carried out the spirit of the law——

Mr. CORLISS. I have not any doubt about that, and I have as much appreciation and admiration for the present Secretary of Agriculture as you can have; but I want to say to you——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. HILL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut rise to oppose the amendment?

Mr. HILL. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment; but I am more interested in a place to put seed than I am in dinner pails. I would like to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. I understand there is a large immigration from Finland to the southeastern part of Alaska and the Aleutian Islands. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands if it is possible for foreigners to locate under existing land laws in Alaska or take up land and improve it?

Mr. LATIMER. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LATIMER. The agreement was when we went in under the five-minute rule that we should be confined to the bill before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that in my five minutes the question I have put may be answered by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LATIMER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Chairman, a word in reply to what the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] has had to say about the distribution of seeds. We expected from him, a city member, such insults as he has offered to the laboring men and the farmers by this amendment, but we did not expect that he would so far forget himself as to make unjust reflections upon the present worthy Secretary of Agriculture as to the character of the seed sent out. I presume also that the Parke-Davis Drug Company of Detroit is fighting the Secretary because of his free distribution of vaccine for blackleg in cattle. We can expect on the seed question the opposition of the gentleman, who has within his district, as disclosed by this debate, the great seed house of D. M. Ferry & Co., and the gentleman appears to be representing them as against the great body of the farmers of the United States.

The distribution of seeds does the people more good than any other equal amount of money spent by the Government. The seeds that are sent out are the most valuable that can be had, and the people want them because they are better than they can buy. Since the seed distribution began there has been a great improvement in all sections of the country in gardening and more of it. We find on the large country farms as well as the little homesteads in and around the cities more vegetables with which to support life and make people independent than we did before this practice began. It is a benefit to the people and they want the seeds.

So far as my vote is concerned, it shall be given to retain the law as it is—to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to buy such valuable seeds as are adapted to our soil, and permit them to be distributed among the people who desire to experiment with them.

Since the gentleman claims to be so economical, I will ask him to answer, in my time, whether he is in favor of the Payne-Hanna ship-subsidy bill and the Pacific cable bill, which will require millions. He refuses to pay any attention to my question. I therefore assume he is in favor of both of them.

So far as I am concerned, I hope the laboring men of his district and the farmers, if he has any such constituents, will rebuke the insult that he has offered to them by his ridiculous amendment. This "dinner-pail" business should not aid him with any laboring man, for they do not object to the seeds being sent to the farmers. It is an insult to that class of honest voters to make such an appeal to them. I see the gentleman rise, and I again ask him to tell the House whether he is in favor of the Pacific cable bill and in favor of the Payne-Hanna ship-subsidy bill. I can not get him to answer, and yet he objects to this small appropriation for seed.

Mr. HILL. I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order, under the ruling just made.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish to call the attention of members of the committee to the different kinds of seeds appropriated for in this bill. Seeds distributed by Congressmen come under the provision beginning on line 17, page 26, of this bill. It is in these words:

For the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants.

Now, if you will turn to the top of page 29 you will find this proviso:

Provided further, That $20,000 of the sum thus appropriated, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used to collect, purchase, test, propagate, and distribute rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries for experiments with reference to their introduction into this country.

The seeds distributed by us are simply valuable seeds, not rare seeds. The seeds distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture under the $20,000 appropriation are rare seeds, mostly obtained abroad for experimental purposes in this country.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, this is a very singular amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan. I would like to ask him what kind of a plant the "dinner pail" is. I know that in my district and my part of the country we have various kinds of seeds, but I have never yet seen any of that kind. Down in my district we have good, pure, healthy seed furnished by the Agricultural Department, which, in fertile soil and under a generous sun, have brought forth manifold fine products with which to support both man and beast. I want to ask the gentleman what kind of a pail he proposes to introduce among the laboring people of this country, or did he say piggin?

Does he propose to ridicule the farmers of our country or does he propose to insult them? It seems to me an insult to the laboring people of this land that he should get up here and offer to give them a piggin with nothing in the world in it—just as the Republicans always treat the great mass of the people of this country, feeding them only on promises. The gentleman has uncovered the policy of that party with regard to the farmers and the laboring people, whom they are always trying to deceive by the merest bosh and demagoguery, pretending to be their friends; and now you come forward with an empty piggin, with nothing in the world in it, instead of giving them something in reality. The gentleman himself looks as if he had been standing for some time by the side of an empty piggin [laughter], and he desires to place that kind of a piggin before the laboring people of the country in order to reduce them to a helpless and forlorn condition.

The gentleman has spoken of class legislation. Let me say that no legislation in the interest of the great mass of the farmers can be characterized as class legislation; because when you pass a law that benefits the agricultural people, you thereby benefit every other man, woman, and child belonging to every other class or profession; because agriculture is the foundation stone of all prosperity and all happiness. It is the farmers who raise up the men and the "boys" to fight the battles of our country and to run the machinery of our great factories. It is the farmers who pay 80 per cent of these appropriations which are passed by these billion-dollar Congresses—these Republican Congresses—of late, and now you want to cap the climax by giving them an empty piggin. Stop the farm and the fire goes out in the furnace. Stop the plow and your streets in the great cities will grow up in grass.

Why, Mr. Chairman, just think for a moment. Think of the old farmer at the end of the year, when he is becoming old, when he is growing tired, weary with hard work, hardly able to make both ends meet. But he goes around to every other class of people in the community to pay his honest obligations in the fall of the year. He goes to the lawyer's office—and many of the lawyers are here present—to pay his fee. And, with his hands in his vest, he says, "Well, it has been a hard time; you are the bone and sinew of the land; and I will not charge you so much as I otherwise would. I hope you will have better crops next year." And all the time he is cramming the money into his pocket which has been raised by the sweat and the toil of the old man. He goes to the teacher, to the professor, who has already put his bill up to a pretty high notch and he can afford to scale it down, and says, "I have come to pay my bill." He says to the farmer, "You have had a hard time this year; you are the bone and sinew; crops have been bad, and I won't charge you as much as I otherwise would." And all the time he is cramming the money into his pocket. He goes to the merchant and pays up his bill, and the merchant tells him he must keep out of politics.

He goes to the doctor and finds the same treatment there; and finally he goes to the preacher, the good old preacher, who takes him into his study and says, "I know you are behind this year, for you have been sick and have had poor crops." The old farmer says, "I came to pay the pastor's salary," and the pastor, while he is cramming the money into his pocket, says, "I know that you are the bone and sinew of the country; you have had a hard time this year, but if you do not get your blessings now you will in the 'sweet bye and bye.'" [Laughter and applause.] So it goes; he pays the money that keeps things going for all other classes.

And the gentleman from Michigan, on the top of all of this, comes up here with his little piggin, can, or something of that kind, to force it upon the working people of this country with nothing in it; because it appears that he has been standing for some time inside of one of them, with nothing in it whatever. [Laughter and applause.]

Let us do away with any such stuff in the shape of an amendment and give a liberal appropriation to those who are the very foundation of this great Government in time of peace or war.

Recognize the great mass of the farmers, who furnish 70 per cent of our export product to settle our balances with foreign nations. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend by inserting in the fourth line, before the word "dinner," the words—— [Cries of "Louder!" "Louder!"] Amend in the fourth line, before the word "dinner"—— [Renewed cries of "Louder!" and laughter.] I ask the Clerk to read. [Laughter and applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

In the fourth line, before the word "dinner," add the words "Atkinson's workingman's;" so that it will read, when amended, "Atkinson's workingman's dinner pail for the laboring people."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TALBERT. I move to lay the amendment and the gentleman from Michigan both on the table. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, has not debate been exhausted upon the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it has been.

Mr. TALBERT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Michigan be allowed to put something in the pail. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be recognized by unanimous consent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. For five minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. For five minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was offered by myself in perfect good faith. I am satisfied the members of this House are determined to have the privilege of sending to their constituents seeds that are purchased and have been purchased for a great many years for the purpose of pleasing certain members and certain numbers of people in each district throughout the country. It is wrong in principle and it ought not to be tolerated any longer. Now, if the Agricultural Department——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman yield for an instant?

Mr. CORLISS. Unless I can have my time extended——

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman simply what he does with his own quota of seed?

Mr. CORLISS. I will be perfectly frank with the gentleman. I have given nearly all of them to my people in my district. Many do not desire them; others do. I send them where they are desired. I have traded them off in some instances for good maps and valuable documents, which my people are interested in and do want, and in that way I utilize the privilege which has been extended under the law. It is wrong and I desire to go upon record as opposed to it; but as you are disposed to give to a few of the farmers to whom you want to extend a little courtesy some seeds that perhaps are mere shells with nothing in them, I insist that the laboring men of my district shall be permitted to have dinner pails, because under the Administration of the Republican party during the last three years, thank God, the laboring people of my district have something to put in their dinner pails, which they did not have under the Democratic Administration.

Mr. GAINES. What did the Administration put in our Spanish war soldiers' pails? Rotten beef.

Mr. CORLISS. I want to say to you that the Agricultural Department would buy a pail that would be large enough to fill with the dinner that a good, honest laboring man of this country would desire, and that he could fill with the wages he now receives.

Mr. ATWATER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes.

Mr. ATWATER. Has the gentleman ever received any notice from any one of his constituents that they did not want the seeds that were sent to them?

Mr. CORLISS. I have been told by a great many people in my city that they did not want the seed and that they could not use them; and not only that, but there are 500 little corner groceries in my district that sell seed to the agricultural districts outside, who are thereby deprived of a little revenue that they would get by the sale of the seeds.

Mr. ATWATER. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has ever been notified by any farmers that they did not want the seeds that were sent them?

Mr. CORLISS. I have been notified by farmers that they tried these seeds that I sent them two years ago and a year ago, and that they did not grow, and they thought they were worthless; that they were seeds that had been taken from old stock and had been sold to the Department by men who desired to impose upon the public.

Mr. ATWATER. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. CORLISS. Farmers and gardeners have told me, and men who have planted the seeds in their gardens have told me, that the seeds would not grow, and, in my opinion, Mr. Chairman, not to exceed 10 per cent of these seeds will grow.

Mr. ATWATER. Does the gentleman undertake to say to this House that the Secretary of Agriculture is buying seeds that are worthless?

Mr. CORLISS. I lay the blame right here in this House and in the Senate, where it belongs. I say that when you pass laws appropriating money contrary to the spirit of the original act creating that Department, you are violating your oaths of office. If the law has been amended, it is unjust and ought to be corrected; and I will offer an amendment further on to correct it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS].

The question being taken: on a division (demanded by Mr. CORLISS) there were—ayes 2, noes 65.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment here.

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after line 16 on page 26, all of page 27, and all on page 28. That strikes out all the appropriation for the common garden seeds and leaves in that part which appropriates $20,000 for rare and valuable seeds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on that amendment I wish to make a few remarks. I represent, perhaps, the largest agricultural constituency of any man on this floor; and while I have no authority to speak for them, still I am willing to go back and meet them upon this question. The principle that appropriates money to send out garden seeds is wrong. I can just as conscientiously come before you and ask you to send out improved breeds of cattle, hogs, and horses to the people of the United States as to send out these garden seeds. I offer this amendment on principle, because we are following a custom here that is wrong. I want to say to members that if you think you are pandering to the farmers, on the theory that you can buy a farmer for 13 cents' worth of seed, you are putting a low estimate upon the farmers of this country.

Mr. BALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. BALL. Has the gentleman anything against the farmers of Kansas?

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. Have I got anything against them? No, sir; nothing. I am a farmer myself; a de facto farmer and not an agriculturist. I simply say that the principle is wrong; but I believe this House is going to pass this provision. You see the iniquity of the proceeding and the tendency that it has when it has already doubled the money expended. Why have you any right to send out garden seed?

We want seed corn and seed wheat, and yet you want to go on; and you are pandering to the farmer, to obtain his good will, thinking you can do so by sending him a small package of garden seed that can be bought in any city or town in this country for 13 cents a package. I say such a proposition is ridiculous. I will send them out if the appropriation is made, but I do not believe in the principle, which is simply to give a fellow 13 cents' worth of garden seeds. I do not believe that anybody can be elected to Congress by a package of garden seed.

Mr. STEELE. What are the rare seeds worth?

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. Oh, the original proposition of this was all right. The principle of the Government was to buy rare seeds and let those to whom they were sent make experiments. The gentleman from Indiana who has just interrupted me spoke in regard to Alaska yesterday. He says that in Alaska they never have had any agriculture. That is the thing that the experimental station was instituted for; to make experiments in new country, where it has never been done, and it is the province of the Agricultural Department to make experiments in new and rare seeds and to get new markets; but beets and turnips and cabbages are not rare seed, and it is ridiculous to say that they should be distributed. I hope, gentlemen, the amendment I offered will be adopted. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CORLISS. My dinner pail is bearing fruit. I have got another man to stand with me, and I earnestly hope that this motion will prevail. It has been discussed, I know, in Congress a long time. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will announce that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas can apply to only that portion of the bill which has already been read, but it will be accepted as a notice of a proposed amendment to that portion which has not been read. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the section just read. On page 27, after the word "Columbia," insert "and not less than $90,000 shall be allowed for Congressional distribution." I want to say to the House that this amendment has been agreed to by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the House is content to have the appropriation. I am willing that the amendment should be made.

Mr. LATIMER. The object is simply to give Members of Congress and Senators a larger share in this appropriation, that they may pay for the seed, and then they will be given to them to distribute instead of doing so in the other words used in the bill. We have already appropriated $175,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 27, line 2, after the word "Columbia," insert "and not less than $90,000 shall be allowed for Congressional distribution."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seed so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds, suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States. An equal proportion of two-thirds of all seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the Department upon the receipt of their addressed franks; and the person receiving such seeds shall be requested to inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith: Provided, That all seeds, bulbs, plants, and cuttings herein allotted to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution remaining uncalled for on the 1st of May shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress, and who have not before, during the same season, been supplied by the Department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-second parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery on the 10th day of January, or at the earliest practicable time thereafter: Provided further, That $30,000 of the sum thus appropriated, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used to collect, purchase, test, propagate, and distribute rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, from foreign countries for experiments with reference to their introduction into this country; and the seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants thus collected, purchased, tested, and propagated shall not be included in general distribution, but shall be used for experimental tests, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experiment stations.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. Line 25, page 27, strike out the word "May" and insert "March."

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 25, page 27, strike out the word "May" and insert the word "March."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to have the House decide that question for itself. It is a matter for its own convenience, and is not important.

Mr. LATIMER. I want to state the object of the amendment. Under this bill all seed not called for by May 1 revert back to the Secretary of Agriculture. This is too late to send seed to the South, so that if the 1st of March is substituted for May all seed not called for by members will be left with the Secretary two months earlier, and can be given to members by the Secretary in time to distribute. Those who desire their full quota have only to notify the Secretary of this fact, and they will be kept for them; but if you fail to notify him and they revert to the Secretary, they ought to by the 1st of March, so that he can allot them to members who desire to send them out. That is the object of this amendment.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he has any information as to the percentage of allotments that do not go out among the people, that are not distributed by members?

Mr. LATIMER. I think most of the seed are given out, although late. But it will be a great advantage to members to have it early enough to send them out. The Assistant Secretary told me that no more seed could be allotted until after May 1. If then the members failed to claim their quota, we might get some more; but if they do not come in until the 1st of May, it is too late for the South.

Mr. LLOYD. I want to ask if there is not a suggestion made anywhere here with reference to what he shall do with the allotments that lapse?

Mr. LATIMER. Under the law the Secretary gives them to the members of Congress.

Mr. LLOYD. But he does not distribute them again?

Mr. LATIMER. He has the authority to distribute them himself.

Mr. LLOYD. But he only distributes them to persons who ask for them?

Mr. LATIMER. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. It does not add anything to the allotment of members?

Mr. LATIMER. Only as the Secretary may give them out on request will it add to their allotment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want to say to the gentleman from South Carolina that if he will turn to the bill——

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina what his proposition is?

Mr. LATIMER. It is to change the time that seeds shall lapse from May 1 until March 1.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. I think that is a very unfair proposition to submit to the House.

Mr. LATIMER. I do not believe the gentleman would make that statement if he understood the proposition.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. It may be of some convenience to the gentleman from South Carolina, but it would be a very great inconvenience to gentlemen from the North.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, I will show that it is no great inconvenience to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. I want to say to the gentleman that the great bulk of our seeds are sent out after the 1st of March.

Mr. LATIMER. That will be no inconvenience to gentlemen from the North. Members can notify the Secretary of Agriculture that they shall want their full quota and they will be retained for them.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania. I do not think the Representatives from the North should be required to notify the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the gentleman will permit me, he will notice on page 28, at the bottom, the following provision:

> That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-second parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery on the 10th day of January, or at the earliest practicable time thereafter.

Now, that gives gentlemen from the South from the 10th of January until the 1st of May. We do not need our seed in the North until about the 1st of April.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. We do not get thawed out until the 1st of May.

Mr. LATIMER. This was a suggestion made by the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, and he said it was a suggestion that he thought would meet with the approval of the House. I am perfectly willing to leave it with the House.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I talked with the Secretary of Agriculture and the Assistant Secretary, and I hope members will give me their attention, not so much for the way in which I say it as for what I say. The way it is now, the quotas of Congressmen are not subject to the action of the Secretary of Agriculture until the 1st of May; therefore, all such quotas as fall to the Secretary after the 1st of May go entirely to the North. Why? The planting season for garden seeds has gone by in the South, and the operation of the law as it now stands is entirely sectional.

I went down there and wanted to get an additional quota of seeds, because I had such a demand for them from our people, and the Secretary says: "I shall have some quotas that have been allotted by the 1st of May, but until then I do not know how many or what I shall have." Well, after that time every quota that is forfeited, let it be a Southern, a Northern, an Eastern, or a Western, and they must go entirely to the North, where it is not too late for garden purposes. The suggestion of the Secretary to make it the 1st of March would enable him to redistribute the quotas all over the country, because it is early enough to plant in gardens over the entire country.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The best way would be to give us a quota and a half apiece to start with.

Mr. SIMS. We are doubling the quota now. Consequently, if there should be any number of quotas forfeited to the Agricultural Department because not called for, there would be an additional number go to the North, because it would be too late for planting in the Southern country and the South would have no use for them. So the Secretary of Agriculture has made this suggestion himself. It does not force members to send their seeds any earlier. All that is necessary is to notify him before the 1st of March that they will want their quota, and those who do not so notify him can be used just as is that portion that is given to the Secretary of Agriculture. That is the object of the amendment; not to draw the line or take any advantage, but to keep the law as it now is from operating so as to make it an advantage for one part of the country and a disadvantage for the other.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Why not have an amendment requiring those seeds for the South to be forfeited by the 1st of March, and when forfeited to go to the South, and leave the others just as they are?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think one date can be made satisfactory to both sides.

Mr. KLUTTZ. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will consent to April 1 instead of March 1.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I think it is the desire of the House to harmonize on this question, and so I agree to change it from the 1st of March to the 1st of April; and then I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina will be changed from March 1 to April 1. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 25, strike out "May" and insert "April."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 71, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Line 10, page 27, after the word "shall," insert "only such as are rare and uncommon seeds."

Mr. WADSWORTH. That amendment would destroy the whole effect of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I make the point of order that we can not hear anything that is being said.

Mr. McRAE. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Nobody has heard the amendment.

Mr. McRAE. I heard part of it; and I make the point of order that it changes existing law, and it therefore is not in order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Let us hear the amendment read.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] desire to debate the point of order?

Mr. CORLISS. I will simply say that the law now provides—I refer to the statute—that these purchases of seeds shall be confined to rare and uncommon seeds; and I submit there is no law contradicting that, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts; at least I have not been able to find any.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a word upon the question of order. Although my memory is that the law has been altered so as to permit the distribution of all kinds of seeds, yet there is nothing in parliamentary law which would prevent Congress from declining to appropriate for some of the seeds for which under the law it would be permitted to appropriate. That is to say, under the old law the only kind of seeds which could be provided for in an appropriation bill was rare and valuable seeds.

Now, the law has been so amended that all kinds of seeds can be appropriated for. Under the old law a point of order would lie against any appropriation for any kind of seed except rare and valuable seed; but now that the law is extended so as to cover all kinds of seeds, it is not out of order for the House of Representatives to decline to appropriate for some part of the seeds which it might appropriate for if it saw fit. There is no change of existing law; there is simply a refusal on the part of the House of Representatives—if they should adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan—to appropriate for some purposes for which they were authorized by law to appropriate. I submit respectfully to the Chair that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan is in order under the rules of this House.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, the mere statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] shows that this amendment, if adopted, would be a change of law. Congress, after due consideration, so changed the law that the Secretary of Agriculture would not be required to spend the seed money for the class of seeds of which the amendment speaks, except in his own discretion, and now to instruct him by law to use all this money or any part of it for that kind of seeds—rare and uncommon—would be to change the law and take from him the discretion to use this money as he might see fit in the purchase of valuable seed adapted to the soil in the various States. There can be no question about the fact that the amendment would change the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. One moment, Mr. Chairman, on the point of order. The point is that the amendment changes existing law. We need first to know what the existing law is and then what the amendment is. The existing law—and the provision of the bill is a repetition of the existing law—is that "the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum as nearly as practicable in the purchase and distribution of such valuable seeds, etc., the best he can obtain at public or private sale."

Now, if the gentleman's amendment is adopted, the law will provide that he is to expend this money for valuable seeds, the best he can obtain at public or private sale, but only such as are rare and uncommon. Now, when we undertake to confine the expenditure of this money to the purchase of seeds which are rare and uncommon, there is undoubtedly a change of existing law.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a single authority which I think is conclusive upon this question. It is a decision made on the 17th of January, 1896, by Mr. Dingley, of Maine, then acting as Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. It was a decision made after two weeks of debate. A point of order had been reserved, and the decision was withheld for two weeks; therefore the greatest consideration was given to the question of order.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire only to refer to a single sentence from the decision found on page 309 of Hinds's Digest. I quote from the decision:

The House in Committee of the Whole has the right to refuse to appropriate for any object which it may deem improper, although that object may be authorized by law.

And while, by existing law, the House may make appropriations for all kinds of seeds, it is not for that reason bound to appropriate for them, but it may decline to appropriate for seeds altogether or may decline to appropriate for such seeds as in its wisdom it sees fit to exclude. So long as the seeds conform to the description prescribed by law, an added qualification limits the seeds, but does not change the law.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, there can be no question, not on the merits of the amendment, for that is an entirely different question, but on the parliamentary status of the amendment, and I submit that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. McRAE. If, Mr. Chairman, the amendment involved the question of the refusal to appropriate at all, unquestionably the point of order should not be sustained against it. But that is not the question involved. Of course the whole or any part of the appropriation could be stricken out. But the gentleman does not make that motion. He simply moves that this appropriation shall not be used in accordance with existing law and directs another way for it to be used. If that was not the purpose of it, the amendment would not be offered at all.

It is proposed here to require the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase an entirely different character of seeds from what the statute requires, destroying his discretion under the law and compelling him to buy rare and uncommon seeds. The law requires him to purchase valuable seeds adapted to the various sections of the United States.

It is manifestly a change of existing law, and I hope the Chair will so hold.

Mr. HOPKINS. Can we have the amendment read again for the information of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported, as follows:

In line 10, page 27, after the word "shall," insert the words "be only such as are rare and uncommon seeds."

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, in 1897 there was a change in the law with reference to the purchase of seeds. The law provided for—

The purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds.

The other words that have been quoted here in this debate it will be seen are omitted.

Again, in 1898, the language is:

For the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, etc.

It will be seen that the words "rare and uncommon seeds" are not used in that connection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was also the law in 1899.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman——

Several members addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOODY] I think is in error in the position he takes. A slight analysis of his argument will show that his position is not well taken. This Congress may refuse to make the appropriation altogether. But if it attempts to make the appropriation, that appropriation must be made in accordance with the law; and the law has provided how this shall be done.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman, before he proceeds, permit me to call his attention to a paragraph from the ruling of Mr. Dingley, from which I have already quoted?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Dingley, in that ruling, referred to a precedent which had been cited, which authorized the printing of greenbacks of certain denominations. And the proviso in the following words was held to be in order on an appropriation bill:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not use any money appropriated by this paragraph for the printing of greenbacks of a larger denomination than those that are canceled.

In connection with that proviso Mr. Dingley uses this language:

Now look for a moment at the principle of limitation or restriction as established by that proviso. In that case the law authorized the printing of greenbacks of any denomination in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The proviso limited the use of the money which was appropriated in that single year to the printing of denominations which should not be smaller than those that were canceled. Now, observe that the limitation was simply this: The appropriation could not be used for a purpose authorized by law. That is all the limitation there was to it.

And he goes on and approves this decision, which it seems to me is precisely the question presented here.

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes; but, Mr. Chairman, that is a limitation, and this is an absolute change of the law as it has been read by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. It is entirely different from the law as proposed in the pending amendment. I agree with the gentleman that we can withhold an appropriation if we see fit, but if we attempt to make an appropriation we must make it in accordance with existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] is well taken, for the reason that existing law provides that a certain kind or class of seeds shall be purchased and distributed, while the amendment would entirely change the character of the seeds now permitted by law; therefore the point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry: For carrying out the provisions of an act of May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, and the act of August 30, 1890, providing for an inspection of meats and animals, and also the provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, providing for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof which are the subjects of interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes: Provided, That live horses and the products and carcasses thereof be entitled to the same inspection as other animals, carcasses, and products thereof herein named: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may in his discretion waive the requirements of a certificate with beef and other products, which are exported to countries that do not require such inspection, $1,000,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, in such manner as he may think best, in the collection of information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products, and to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, blackleg, tuberculosis, sheep scab, glanders or farcy, hog cholera, and other diseases of animals, and for this purpose to employ as many persons as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another, for improving and maintaining the Bureau Experiment Station, at Bethesda, Md.; for printing and publishing such reports relating to animal industry as he may direct; and the Secretary of Agriculture may use so much of this sum as he deems necessary for promoting the extension and development of foreign markets for dairy and other animal products of the United States, and for suitable transportation of the same; and such products may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is authorized to apply the moneys received from the sales of such products toward the continuation and repetition of such experimental exports; and the Secretary is hereby authorized to rent a suitable building in the District of Columbia, at an annual rental not exceeding $1,800, to be used as a laboratory for said Bureau of Animal Industry, and the employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry outside of the city of Washington may hereafter, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be granted leaves of absence not to exceed fifteen days in any one year.

Mr. MAHON. I desire to give notice that I shall raise a point of order against the next paragraph, because it is new legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not hear the gentleman's point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania gave notice that he intended to raise a point of order to the next section when read.

Mr. CORLISS. I desire to offer an amendment to the section just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 24, page 30, by striking out the word "blackleg."

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The section has been passed by the committee.

Mr. CORLISS. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it had not.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not well taken. The gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to eliminate from the Agricultural Department the manufacture of what is known as blackleg vaccine. I have in my district the largest manufactory of drugs in the world. Two years before the Agricultural Department commenced the development of the remedy known as blackleg vaccine the concern in my district which I have mentioned had manufactured it, demonstrated its value, and placed it upon the market, and for years they have been selling the blackleg vaccine against the free distribution thereof by the Agricultural Department.

Now, I submit that the true purpose of the Agricultural Department is to develop, experiment, and ascertain remedies for disease, that when they ascertain a result they should publish it to the world. They should give the citizens of our country the knowledge and information that they have obtained by their investigations. They should show how the application can be made, but they should not go into the business of supplying a well-known remedy like this. They might just as well undertake to usurp the right to manufacture all the remedies for the suppression of yellow fever, smallpox, and other well-known diseases which are prevalent among the human family as to undertake to manufacture in large quantities, as they do, this blackleg vaccine, and furnish free to the public a product that is perfectly well known in the market and that is sold universally throughout this country.

I say when the Agricultural Department has reached the stage that it has reached with reference to this article it should go out of the business and permit private enterprise to continue it, and proceed to the investigation of other questions which are not well determined. They have done this in many other instances. Why should they continue the manufacture of this article? We have in my city, as I say, a manufacturing institution that can supply the world. They commenced the manufacture of this remedy before the Agricultural Department ever thought of going into the subject, and they can furnish it to anyone who wishes it.

Mr. HEPBURN. At 15 cents a dose.

Mr. CORLISS. At 15 cents a dose; yes. Why should you in your district get blackleg vaccine for nothing and I in my district be compelled to pay the taxes for the benefit of a few citizens in your district?

Mr. HEPBURN. The Government furnishes it at the tenth part of a cent.

Mr. CORLISS. Why, there are men in my city who are engaged in this enterprise, and must depend upon this for a livelihood, and why should your farmer be supplied with the blackleg vaccine which they can manufacture? I hope and trust that this particular article will be eliminated from the bill, and that the Agricultural Department, in this instance at least, will be confined to experiments, to investigation and promulgation of knowledge, and not to competition with private enterprises in our country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it does not make any difference whether this language remains in the bill or not. It does not matter whether the word "blackleg" is stricken out. It was simply inserted there at the request of the cattle interests of the West; but even if stricken out, the Secretary of Agriculture would go on, under the general power given him by the bill, with the experiments with vaccine for the cure of blackleg.

Mr. McRAE. You do not want it stricken out?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; I only say that even if the House should strike it out, it would make no difference; that the Secretary would go and make his experiments. He says in his last annual report:

LOSS FROM BLACKLEG.

According to the latest report, it is estimated that the annual loss of cattle from the disease known as blackleg, or symptomatic anthrax, in the districts principally affected has ranged from 5 to 35 per cent. The Bureau of Animal Industry has been for some time distributing a vaccine for the prevention of this disease, and this, it is estimated, has reduced the loss to 0.54 per cent among the animals treated. As it is known that a large percentage of this loss was due to careless operators, it is believed that with more care in the use of the vaccine future investigations will show a still further reduction. Vaccine is still being sent out, and during the fiscal year 545,289 doses were distributed. The indications are that the contagion gradually dies out where systematic inoculations are practiced, and it was with the hope of eradicating the disease from many sections that the preparation of vaccine was undertaken.

The law gives him power to prevent the spread of pleuropneumonia and other diseases; so I say that the Secretary is still within the power given him by Congress.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the motion of the gentleman from Michigan will not prevail. The Secretary is making an intelligent and effective effort to stamp out this disease, which is so fatal and so destructive to large property interests. I represent a district which is perhaps as largely devoted to the raising of cattle as any represented on this floor. The people who keep cattle in my district are unanimous in demanding that the Secretary shall be allowed to continue the distribution of blackleg vaccine. The cost to the Government is trifling. The Secretary assures me that this blackleg vaccine can be manufactured for about one-tenth of a cent a dose. The vaccine manufactured by private manufacturers is found to be an inferior article.

According to the testimony of not one but dozens and hundreds of cattlemen that has been coming to me for the last three months the vaccine distributed by the Government is almost uniformly effective, and that which is manufactured by private enterprises is almost uniformly ineffective. In my district in one of the counties largely given to the raising of cattle this blackleg has broken out to an alarming extent, and about two weeks ago the daily losses were said to be very heavy. At the request of the cattle growers of that county I induced the Secretary to send out a special supply of vaccine, and from the information that has come to me by mail and telegraph I am advised that the efforts that are being made there to stamp out the disease have met with the most satisfactory results. I hope, sir, that these cattlemen who get this little benefit from the Government will not have their right interfered with now.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KLEBERG. Is it not a fact that all the stock associations in Texas and all over the West ask for this?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was going to mention that fact. The cattle raisers' association which lately assembled at Fort Worth, which has quite a large membership from the cattle raisers of Texas, New Mexico, Colorado, Indian Territory, Oklahoma, and Arizona, passed a resolution unanimously requesting that the Secretary of Agriculture continue to exercise the right of distributing this vaccine.

Mr. STOKES. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the cost of producing this vaccine by the Department of Agriculture was about a tenth of a cent a dose.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STOKES. Have you any information what it costs when it is purchased from private manufacturers?

Mr. SLAYDEN. From 20 to 25 cents a dose for an inferior quality. The Secretary assures me that it cost probably the tenth of a cent a dose to manufacture.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. CORLISS. If you are willing that the Agricultural Department shall manufacture an article of supply because it costs more to produce it by private enterprise, why not have the Secretary go into the oil business, and go into competition with the Standard Oil Company? I think it would be just as wise.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. CORLISS. Are you in favor of the Secretary of Agriculture going into refining oil?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand it, has the right to carry on this experiment of trying to find a remedy for diseases of cattle, although in my section of country, and with the cattle of my State, so far as the effect of this remedy is concerned, it is no longer an experiment. He is now entitled to the right to continue the experiment, just as he would have the right to continue experiments with strange forage plants, and to do anything else that is for the accommodation of agriculture.

Mr. CORLISS. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is nothing more than experiment about it? Is there anything further to develop? Do you contend that there is anything further in the shape of experiment necessary to produce blackleg vaccine?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know that there is anything necessary, and I do not know that there is anything not necessary.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Perhaps I can answer that question.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Just one moment. I want to say that I do not know that this vaccine may not be improved; but I do know this, that the Secretary of Agriculture has made improvements lately, and he tells me he believes that he has succeeded in securing a serum which will prevent hog cholera, the commercial advantage of which no gentleman in this House will undertake to estimate, and I do not want to see his intelligent and useful work interfered with.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman from Michigan, I am informed by the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry that this cultivation and production of vaccine virus for blackleg is still in its experimental state. They do not regard the present product as perfection; they are still experimenting, and they desire the privilege of continuing their experiments.

Mr. CORLISS. I do not object to that. What I object to is the manufacture and distribution of it over the country to the exclusion of an article well known on the market.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know why the distribution of vaccine matter is not proper and just as a sanitary measure and why it is not a proper thing for the Government to see that diseased meat is not sold in the market. I can not see why it is not a just and proper regulation of the Government. The proper distribution of this vaccine matter unquestionably has a tendency to insure the purity of the meat. Now, gentlemen may say that it is spoiling some business in the country. Well, it may to a limited extent.

Mr. CORLISS. Parties were manufacturing this long before the Agricultural Department commenced it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be. We appoint inspectors. We have persons appointed to see that cattle that are diseased do not come into the country. We take a great many precautions against diseased meat, and it is a proper governmental regulation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And under this very paragraph, too.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As the gentleman says, under this very paragraph. Unquestionably the tendency might be to produce an interference with the business of some manufacturer, but if we stop this disease it would make the meat better, and consequently it comes clearly within the sanitary power of the Government.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I come from a very large district of cattlemen who are deeply interested in this subject. I have numerous letters from them to the effect that the Government virus is far superior to that manufactured by the private industries referred to by the gentleman from Michigan. There is nothing that the Government can spend money for that would be of greater benefit to the people than to continue the experiments along the line that are now being conducted. The blackleg is a disease that attacks young animals, calves and yearlings, and, as has been stated, from 5 to 35 per cent of them are lost each year. Since the Agricultural Department has taken up this question they have greatly reduced the losses. I think it would be for the benefit of the entire country that this blackleg vaccine should be continued to be used and that the industry be not stifled at the present time.

Mr. FLYNN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state with reference to this matter that I have had at least a thousand lettlers within the last ninety days concerning this very matter, and every one of the men having cattle state that they have tried the other matter furnished them by the private firms and the losses are in a great measure larger after the use of that purchased from these firms than after that which they get from the Government.

I do not believe there is a man in the West, where blackleg is prevalent, who would not sanction and urge the passage by this House of an appropriation by the Government to maintain the distribution of this vaccine matter. Of course it is hard upon some individual firms. Everything the Government does interferes, in a measure, with some kind of individual industry. But here is the distribution of a virus to prevent disease that all the people of the United States are interested in stamping out. The cattle business is asking and praying for the distribution of this virus and asking Congress that this matter may be left as it is.

Mr. BAILEY of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I represent a great cattle State; and while I sympathize with the gentleman from Michigan, it is in line with my position on the garden-seed matter. The vaccine matter is still a matter of experiment. It is only within a year or so that it has begun to be used on the range, and the fact of the matter is that the vaccine matter sent out by the Department is not the same as that manufactured by the parties that the gentleman from Michigan speaks of. The original matter put out by these firms took two inoculations to be effective, and it only takes one of this used by the Agricultural Department. Now, when this is finally determined and is no longer an experiment, these gentlemen will get the benefit of it. The Government will introduce it so it will be popular, and then the manufacturing firms will reap the benefit.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is laboring under a misapprehension. This question I have had occasion to investigate, and I say that long before the Agricultural Department ever considered this question of manufacturing blackleg vaccine virus it was manufactured in this country by private enterprise, and I say to you that the product of private enterprise has proven to be as valuable as that manufactured by the Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CORLISS. I can not now; I will in a moment. In answer to my protest it was not contended that the product manufactured by private enterprise was not just as valuable and just as effective as that produced by the Secretary of Agriculture. But he did contend that the disease existed, and he said that the owners of cattle would not buy the blackleg vaccine for the purpose of eradicating the disease. I submit that this statement was not made in the right spirit. It is not the purpose of our Government to compel men to use a particular remedy; and if so, this is not the way to do it. The proper course would be to prosecute men who allow their diseased cattle to go at large.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman say that the product of the laboratories of these manufacturing chemists who sell this vaccine is as good as that which is made and distributed by the Government?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes, sir; and the Secretary of Agriculture does not deny it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Who is the best witness as to that—the man whose cattle get disease and die or the Secretary——

Mr. CORLISS. I can understand that if you have any cattlemen in your district——

Mr. SLAYDEN. We have a few.

Mr. CORLISS. Who want vaccine from the Government gratis, they will tell you that the product of any private enterprise is not as good.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement?

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have received hundreds of letters from gentlemen of honor, repute, and veracity who say that they have tried the product of these manufacturing chemists and that the results show it is nothing like so good as that supplied by the Government.

Mr. CORLISS. The point I make is that the Government of the United States should not go into the business of supplying gratis manufactured products which are well known and which are furnished by private enterprise. The time will come when gentlemen here who speak and vote for provisions of this kind will regret it. The great mass of the people are not getting this product gratis. By its free distribution the Government is benefiting a few; but the people will find out that a few men get all the fruits of this kind of legislation; and then they will wake up to the importance of private enterprise. I ask a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. CORLISS. I have another amendment. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "same," in line 13, page 31, to and including the word "exports," in line 18, page 31. The language which I propose to strike out is as follows:

And such products may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is authorized to apply the moneys received from the sales of such products toward the continuation and repetition of such experimental exports.

Mr. Chairman, as will be observed, this little paragraph authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to go into the open market and buy any product of this country and sell it in foreign lands, and then to take the proceeds and go on thus buying and selling. In other words, he is to go into the jobbing business, buying and selling any product of the farm or any product of our manufactures. He is thus established in a good-sized jobbing house with a million dollars back of him. If you want to authorize such a thing as that, I am willing you should. I want to go on record against it. I have no more to say. I am ready for a vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH. One brief word of explanation. The Secretary of Agriculture has been making some experiments in regard to the manufacture of butter, cheese, and other articles for export. This is a difficult problem to deal with; and this provision authorizes him, in the prosecution of his experiments, to buy small quantities of these articles, and to dispose of them after he has no further use for them.

A MEMBER. This work that he is doing is purely experimental?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Absolutely.

Mr. CORLISS. Does the gentleman contend that the Secretary is limited in his purchases? By this paragraph you appropriate a million dollars; and under this provision he can buy, within the limits of the appropriation, any articles that he chooses.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a pretty broad construction.

Mr. CORLISS. The language "such products" is broad enough to include any products of the farm or the dairy; and these "may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture." There is no limit upon his discretion as to what he may purchase.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let the gentleman read the whole provision together; not a part of it.

Mr. CORLISS. It authorizes the Secretary to go into a wholesale jobbing business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call the gentleman's attention to the clause immediately preceding where the products are specified. The language is:

And the Secretary of Agriculture may use so much of this sum as he deems necessary for promoting the extension and development of foreign markets for dairy and other animal products of the United States, and for suitable transportation of the same; and such products may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CORLISS. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, there is no limit as to the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture in this matter, or as to what he may purchase under this provision of the bill. He may buy $500,000 worth of the products of our farms, and take the money and buy the same quantity over again. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to delay a vote upon this proposition for a single instant. But I do wish to say to the members of the committee that no practical work of the Department of Agriculture since its organization has produced more useful and beneficial results than the experimental work prosecuted by the present Secretary in the direction contemplated by this appropriation, and no money has been more wisely expended than that which has heretofore been expended by the Department for the extension of the foreign market of our dairy products.

The proposition in the pending bill is in line with the recommendation of the Secretary himself, after careful consideration and application of the working of the system, and is in line with the experiments now in progress, which have not only been successful in themselves but have been vastly useful and beneficial to the whole dairy interest of the United States.

I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the merits of the amendment. I am only stating facts of my own knowledge. This same provision has been in the Agricultural appropriation bill for two years—last year and the preceding year.

When the Secretary of Agriculture began work under that appropriation it was found that there was not a ship carrying goods to Europe from this side of the water which had facilities to transport butter or dairy products; not only so, but nobody here knew how to pack butter for the foreign trade, and no merchant in Europe had ever seen a first-rate specimen of the article; and these are only some of the many difficulties with which the Secretary had to contend. To-day, in every market in Europe where imported butter is sold, the dairies of the United States are represented by specimens of the best creamery products of our country; ships are being equipped with refrigerating apparatus, and I repeat that no more effective service has ever been rendered to American agriculture, and especially to the dairy business of the country, than has been rendered by this experimental exportation of its products. [Applause.]

I trust the gentleman from Michigan will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I desire the gentleman to understand that I have as high an appreciation of the value of the services rendered by the Secretary of Agriculture as any other man within the sound of my voice. I do not expect or anticipate in any way that he would take undue advantage of the law or abuse the right which is accorded to him under it, but I am opposing this proposition on general principles. I am talking of the law which you are placing on the statute books, that not only applies to the present Secretary of Agriculture but to all other Secretaries for all future time, unless the law is changed.

I believe that the present Secretary will judicially, properly, and fairly exercise this provision of the law, but do you know—have you assurances—that all Secretaries in the future will do the same thing? You are giving him the right to go into the jobbing business of buying and selling, and the next step will be to furnish him a ship to carry the products to purchasers abroad and enable him to go into that line of business on an entirely independent scale.

I submit that it is wrong in principle; it is bad practice in legislation; and I do not care whether this has been adopted in the last Congress or the Congress before. It is unwise, and we should stop it right now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] as to the Government going into the jobbing business, buying and selling the dairy commodities of the country abroad, it is only necessary to refer him to a fact which will completely meet his argument. The answer to his suggestion is plain and clear, that this bill gives to the Secretary of Agriculture no machinery with which to go into the jobbing business. He can not do that to any considerable extent without a clerical force, and no such force is authorized by the bill. That is a check upon the Secretary of Agriculture going into the business of jobbing. He is doing simply a limited work under a small appropriation, in an experimental business, which has resulted most beneficially in the past, and we have reason to believe that it will result beneficially in the future. It is at all events desirable to continue it for awhile and see whether it will not be of vast benefit to our people. That is all I desire to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buildings for laboratories, Department of Agriculture: For all labor, materials, heating and power apparatus, plumbing, lighting, ventilating, and other necessary expenses in erecting and fitting up suitable fireproof laboratory buildings for the use of the United States Department of Agriculture, on reservation No. 2, in the city of Washington, D. C., all plans and specifications to be approved by and the work to be done under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, $200,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that that is new legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that this is new legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I admit that it is new legislation, and I suppose it will have to go out if the point of order is insisted on. I am exceedingly sorry, however, because it is simply a business proposition for the Government.

The Government is now paying $10,000 a year rent for buildings used as laboratories, and that is 5 per cent on $200,000. It has the land to put these buildings on, and it is a good business investment to put up the buildings called for. It is new legislation and I suppose the point of order, if insisted on, will have to be sustained.

Mr. HOPKINS. Unless the point of order was made on this bill when it was reported, it comes too late now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his point of order?

Mr. MAHON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, when the point of order was under discussion on a previous paragraph, I stated that there had been a change of the general law relating to the distribution of seeds. Several gentlemen expressed a doubt upon that subject. I desire to send to the Clerk's desk, so that it may go in as a part of the debate upon the point of order, the change which was made in the law on a general appropriation bill which became a law without the approval of the President in April, 1896, in the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress. Gentlemen will see that I was right in stating that there had been a change of the general law. I desire to say nothing further about it, except to have it go in with the debate on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to have it read?

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Simply to have it read by the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 527 of the Revised Statutes be amended so that it will read as follows:

"SEC. 527. That purchase and distribution of vegetable, field, and flower seeds, plants, shrubs, vines, bulbs, and cuttings shall be of the freshest and best obtainable varieties and adapted to general cultivation."

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. That was offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], constituting an amendment to the general law.

Mr. MCRAE. The gentleman does not offer this as anything against the decision rendered by the Chair.

Mr. MOODY of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. MCRAE. It simply confirms the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was aware of the statute at the time he made his ruling.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

And then, on motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'GRADY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? If not, the amendments will be voted upon in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ILLINOIS AND MISSISSIPPI CANAL.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was discharged from the consideration of House joint resolution 225, providing for a preliminary survey and estimate for the construction of a lock in the dam across Rock River, at the head of the feeder for the Illinois and Mississippi Canal; and the same was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

And then, on motion of Mr. WADSWORTH (at 4 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement of the receipts, expenditures, and estimated surplus in the Treasury—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the case of the brig Clio, R. M. Ball, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the case of the schooner Polly, Benjamin Shillaber, master, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers relating to certain disallowances of the mileage accounts of Maj. E. H. Ruffner—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Supervising Inspector-General of the Steamboat-Inspection Service on bill H. R. 9925—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed (all except bill).

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report of the Supervising Inspector-General of the Steamboat-Inspection Service on bill H. R. 10154—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed (all except bill).

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Surgeon-General of the Army, with the draft of a bill for establishing the status of acting hospital stewards—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MAHON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9825) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated and to provide for the payment of all just claims against the United States for private property taken and used in the military service within the limits of the United States during the war with Spain, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 980); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SPALDING, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. 66) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain claims of the State of Indiana, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 981); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2938) to create a board of health and to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery in the Indian Territory, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 984); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. LACEY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10590) to set apart a preserve for the American bison, and for other purposes, reported the same in lieu of H. R. 6062, accompanied by a report (No. 985); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8245) to temporarily provide revenue for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes, reported the same with Senate amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 986); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ELLIOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5296) establishing terms of the United States circuit court at Newbern and Elizabeth City, N. C., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 987); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. GRAFF, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10210) granting a pension to Ellen Miles Brown, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 959); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8404) to increase pension of Timothy A. Lewis, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 960); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8157) granting an increase of pension to T. C. Mills, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 961); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. HEDGE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5192) granting a pension to Mrs. Louise Adams, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 962); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1748) for the relief of Mrs. Ellen V. McCleery, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 963); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 9915) granting a pension to Madison T. Trent, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 964); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1570) granting a pension to Susie Margarite Landrum, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 965); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3252) for the relief of Sarah Somerville Lion, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 966); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6564) granting a pension to Anna M. Starr, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 967); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. KENNEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3240) to increase the efficiency of the military establishment of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF BOARD ON GEOGRAPHIC NAMES.

Mr. BURROWS submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, and bound in cloth, 3,000 copies of the Second Report of the United States Board on Geographic Names, transmitted to Congress by the President February 26, 1900, 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 5,000 copies for distribution by said board among the Government Departments, public libraries, and other suitable depositories.

JAMES B. LLOYD.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That James B. Lloyd, a citizen of the State of North Carolina, be, and he is hereby, appointed to the office of Second Acting Assistant Doorkeeper of the Senate, at a compensation of $1,800 per annum, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

EXECUTION OF CRIMINALS IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with public interest, to inform the Senate whether persons have been executed in Porto Rico by the Spanish method of garrote since he has been governing that country as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States; and if so, the President is requested to inform the Senate why this mode of execution was adopted.

READJUSTED SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS IN MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to report upon a schedule to the Senate the readjusted salaries of all postmasters who served in the State of Massachusetts between July 1, 1864, and July 1, 1874, whose names as claimants appear in the Court of Claims in the case entitled Abel R. Proctor and others vs. The United States, No. 18238, each such stated account to conform in all respects to the order of the Postmaster-General published by circular under date of June 9, 1883, and to the requirement of the act of March 3, 1883, as said requirement was published by the Postmaster-General in the newspapers of the country under date of February 17, 1884, and with such report transmit to the Senate a full copy of the text of the construction by the Postmaster-General of the act of March 3, 1883, embodied in the said circular and publication in the newspapers and in circular form No. 1223, the text of each of which, under date of November 8, 1897, was transmitted by the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General for use in the case of Jane Yarrington and others vs. The United States, No. 16345.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. THURSTON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. THURSTON, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas were appointed.

SIOUX CITY AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

The bill (H. R. 2864) to create a commission to make settlement and adjustment with the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company of its indebtedness to the Government of the United States was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, in the absence of objection.

Mr. ALLISON. A similar bill has been reported from the Committee on Pacific Railroads of the Senate; and I ask that the bill which has come from the House of Representatives may be printed and for the present lie upon the table.

Mr. MORGAN. For the present?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes. The House bill which has come to us and the Senate bill which has been reported are very nearly the same. I think it is, therefore, not necessary to refer the House bill. My colleague [Mr. GEAR], who is in charge of the bill, is not now in the Chamber, and I ask that it lie upon the table until he comes in, so that he can propose such disposition of it as he thinks proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid upon the table.

DEMANDS UPON CHINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. PETTIGREW, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether the United States has through its representatives joined with any other nation in making demands upon China; and if so, what is the nature of the demands.

The President is also requested to inform the Senate whether any threat accompany the demands as a penalty for noncompliance.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW subsequently said: I should like to know what became of the resolution that came over from yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I was not aware that that disposition was made of it. My attention was called to something else at the moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion was made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], and declared carried.

FISH STATION IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 2438) to establish a fish-hatching and fish station in the State of West Virginia. It is a very short bill, reported favorably, and with a written report from the Committee on Fisheries.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of West Virginia, including purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment, at some suitable point to be selected by the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATOR FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. TURLEY from the Committee on Privileges and Elections January 23, 1900, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Matthew S. Quay is not entitled to take his seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Michigan to yield to me that I may at this time call up for consideration the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It will greatly, I think, suit the convenience of the Senate, and certainly my convenience, if I can have that bill disposed of to-day, and I trust, now that a day has been fixed for a vote upon the Quay case, the Senator will allow me to call up the appropriation bill and for the moment waive his opportunity to speak to-day.

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose, under the spirit of the order which was made in this case, if not by its express terms, the matter now before the Senate would have to give way to an appropriation bill. I should like very much to proceed this morning, but the Senator from Iowa suggests that it is important not only for the general business, but as a matter in which he is interested personally that the appropriation bill shall be taken up to-day; and if it can be concluded to-day, I shall be willing to accede to the request of the Senator. But I desire to proceed in the morning with what I have to say on this case.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the appropriation bill will be concluded to-day, but the Senator will see how impossible it is for me to make an arrangement that it shall be completed to-day. However, I will say that if it is not completed to-day I would like very much if the Senator would yield long enough to-morrow to complete it. I think it will not take long to-morrow if it is not completed to-day.

Mr. BURROWS. We can undoubtedly come to some understanding about that.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill known as the District of Columbia appropriation bill shall be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire simply to make a brief statement. While it is not stated in the unanimous-consent agreement, which provides that the Quay resolution shall be voted upon on the 24th of April, whether it shall yield to appropriation bills, it was distinctly understood, I believe, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], that even appropriation bills, under the understanding reached yesterday, should yield to this resolution.

I, of course, now that a date has been fixed for the final disposition of the Pennsylvania case, do not desire to further insist upon Senators speaking upon this question, but understanding that the Senator from Michigan has extensive remarks to make upon the subject, and that some ten or twelve other Senators have notified him that they desire to be heard, I do not think that the friends of the resolution should be asked to yield even to appropriation bills or to any other legislation.

The mere fact that a day has been fixed upon which the question shall be finally disposed of renders it all the more important that it shall be fully and thoroughly debated, so that Senators may be enlightened upon this most important question and be enabled to cast their votes at the proper time considerately and intelligently.

Therefore, Mr. President, while I do not object at this time, I deem it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to these circumstances surrounding the case.

Furthermore, I desire to give notice now that if these delays shall be made upon the 24th of April a basis to further postpone this case upon the ground that opportunity has not been given to sufficiently debate it, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these delays have been made fully with the consent of those gentlemen supporting the majority report of the committee, who will be the larger portion of the Senators who desire to be heard upon the case.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that the arrangement on yesterday for a vote did not interfere with the unanimous agreement made some days ago. I think I can assure the Senator from Pennsylvania that there are not many appropriation bills that are likely to intervene during the twelve days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the appropriation bill.

SOUTH AFRICAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I desire to give notice at this time that I shall address the Senate on Friday, immediately after the routine morning business, in support of the resolution offered by me extending sympathy to the people of the South African Republic in their struggle.

Mr. HALE. On Friday of this week?

Mr. PETTIGREW. On next Friday, day after to-morrow.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I also give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall submit my remarks concerning the Naval Observatory. I do not like to name a particular time when I shall insist upon going on, but I will say, as I said before, that whenever there is nothing else before the Senate, or Senators are dilatory in proceeding with other business, I shall endeavor to slip in my remarks.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 9139) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be acted upon as they are reached in the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "General expenses," on page 2, line 20, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seven hundred and eighty" and insert "nine hundred:" in line 21, after the word "dollars," to strike out "fireman, $480" and insert "two firemen, at $480 each;" and on page 3, line 12, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty-nine thousand six hundred and ninety-three" and insert "sixty thousand two hundred and ninety-three;" so as to make the clause read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 16, after the word "dollars," to insert:

Deputy disbursing officer, who shall hereafter, in the absence of the disbursing officer, be authorized to transact all duties pertaining to said disbursing officer, and who shall be required to give bond to the said disbursing officer in the sum of $25,000, conditioned on the faithful performance of the duties of his office, but said disbursing officer to be responsible to the United States, District of Columbia, and the people whom he pays, as now required by law, $1,500.

And on page 5, line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "nineteen thousand four" and insert "twenty thousand nine;" so as to make the clause read:

For auditor's office: For auditor, $3,600; chief clerk, $1,800; bookkeeper, $1,800; clerk, $1,600; disbursing officer, $2,500; deputy disbursing officer, who shall hereafter, in the absence of the disbursing officer, be authorized to transact all duties pertaining to said disbursing officer, and who shall be required to give bond to the said disbursing officer in the sum of $25,000, conditioned on the faithful performance of the duties of his office, but said disbursing officer to be responsible to the United States, District of Columbia, and the people whom he pays, as now required by law, $1,500; 2 clerks, at $1,400 each; 3 clerks, at $1,200 each; clerk, $1,000; messenger, $900; in all, $20,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 25, on page 4, by instruction of the Committee on Appropriations, I move to strike out "two" and insert "three."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the appropriations "For auditor's office," on page 4, line 25, before the word "clerks," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "three;" so as to read:

Three clerks, at $1,400 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In the same clause, on page 5, line 1, before the word "clerks," I move to strike out "three" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Two clerks, at $1,200 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 5, line 3, in consequence of the amendments just adopted, I move to amend by striking out "twenty thousand nine" and inserting "twenty-one thousand one;" so as to make the total appropriation for auditor's office $21,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 5, line 8, after the word "dollars," to insert "stenographer, $900;" and in line 10, before the word "dollars," to insert "nine hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 25, on page 29, it is proposed to insert:

For establishing those portions of a filtration plant which are essential to the operation of either system of filtration adopted, including necessary land, grading, masonry, and appurtenances, $300,000, to be available immediately and until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Public schools," on page 30, after line 6, to strike out:

For officers: For superintendent first eight divisions, $3,600; superintendent ninth, tenth, and eleventh divisions, $2,500; assistant superintendent, who shall be appointed by the Commissioners and give bond and oath, to be approved by them, and perform such duties as they shall prescribe, $2,000; clerk to superintendent of first eight divisions and secretary to board of trustees, $1,200; clerk to superintendent of ninth, tenth, and eleventh divisions, $800; messenger to superintendent first eight divisions, $300; messenger to superintendent ninth, tenth, and eleventh divisions, $200; in all, $10,600.

And to insert:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint seven persons, bona fide residents and taxpayers of the District of Columbia, and who have been such for five years immediately preceding their appointment, who shall constitute a board of education, and whose term of office shall be seven years, except that the terms of the persons first appointed shall terminate as follows: One each year, to be determined by lot among the seven members of the board first appointed. The compensation of members of the board shall be $10 each for personal attendance at each meeting, but shall not exceed for any member $500 per annum. The board shall have complete jurisdiction over all administrative matters connected with the public schools of the District of Columbia, except that all expenditures of public funds for such school purposes shall be made and accounted for as now provided by law under the direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The board shall make all needful rules and regulations which may be proper for the government and control of said schools, and shall make annual report to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress, of the condition and operations of said schools, and the sanitary and structural condition of all buildings in use as well as those in course of construction, with recommendations as respects needed changes.

The board shall have power to appoint 1 superintendent for all the public schools of the District of Columbia, 2 assistant superintendents, a secretary, and 3 clerks, and to remove said officers at its pleasure, and shall also have power to employ and remove all teachers, officers, and other employees connected with the public schools not already specified: Provided, That the graduates of the normal school shall have preference in all cases when appointment of teachers for the public schools are to be made. The superintendent shall annually submit to the board for its approval the course of studies and list of text-books and other apparatus to be used in said schools.

The board shall annually transmit to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia an estimate in detail of the amount of money required for the public schools for the ensuing year, and said Commissioners shall include the same in their annual estimate of appropriations for the District of Columbia.

The foregoing provisions under the head of "Public schools" shall take effect on the 1st day of July, 1900, except the provision authorizing the appointment of the members of said board of education, which shall take effect immediately: Provided, That members of said board shall not enter upon their duties until the 1st day of July as aforesaid; and all acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

For officers: For 7 members of the board of education, at $500 each, $3,500, not more than $1,750 of which shall be used during the first half of the fiscal year; 1 superintendent of public schools, $5,000; 2 assistant superintendents, at $3,000 each; 1 secretary, $2,000; 3 clerks, at $1,500 each; 1 messenger, $720; in all, $21,750.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to modify the amendment on page 32, line 2, by inserting the letter "s" after "normal school;" so as to read: "the graduates of the normal schools."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Also, on page 31, after the word "superintendents," in line 23, I move to insert the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After the word "superintendents," in line 23, page 31, it is proposed to insert:

One of whom, under the direction of the superintendent, shall have charge of schools for colored children.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a remark or two concerning this paragraph. I have taken a great deal of interest in this plan for remodeling the schools of the District of Columbia, and I am greatly pleased to find that what I and a great many others of more consequence desired has been done practically. On page 30, the beginning of the paragraph concerning schools reads as follows:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized * * * to appoint seven persons, bona fide residents and taxpayers of the District of Columbia, * * * who shall constitute a board of education.

Their duties and salaries, etc., are defined. I urged something like that so far as I could, but it was the confident hope of many people that one or two of them should be women, and I understand that in not saying that it was in the minds of the committee that the President would be likely to appoint one or two now. It should be remembered that the vast majority of the teachers are women, many of them young women. In one case there is a male superintendent and all the others are women, and good teachers, so far as I know, so far as they can be under the dreadful system of textbooks, a monstrous innovation which will doubtless be removed. I certainly hope that the President of the United States will see that an excellent woman of experience in teaching will be put upon the board of education, if not two. I make no motion in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations as amended.

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended for additional employees.

So as to read:

For maintaining the disinfecting service, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 3, after the word "thousand," to insert "six hundred;" so as to read:

For the police court: For two judges, at $3,600 each.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, the present salary of the police judges in the District of Columbia is $3,000 each. That amount is found in the bill as it came from the other House, which is the present law, as I understand. The Senate Committee on Appropriations propose to increase it to $3,600.

I do not think I heard any reason whatever given in the committee why this increase should take place. It was not asserted that the judges who are serving at that salary are not efficient, and it seems to me that the raising of the salary to $3,600 is unwarranted by anything that appeared before the committee at least. I do not know what can be said here in the Senate. I know that in my own State—I do not know how it is in the other States in the Union—the supreme court judges receive only $3,000 a year and the district or circuit judges receive $2,000 a year. There has never been a complaint that we did not get efficient service. It may be said that living is higher here, but it seems to me, for police judges, $3,000 is sufficient, when there is no complaint that the men who are serving are not sufficiently qualified. I think there is no reason why the Senate should increase salaries simply because they desire to increase them or to give some man $600 a year more than he is getting.

It seems to me the amendment proposed by the Senate committee ought not to be agreed to. I state this, Mr. President, because there appears to be a general disposition in the present Congress, in the Senate at least, to increase a number of salaries, and I think the attention of the Senate ought to be called to it. I am not in favor of this increase. For that reason I voted against the amendment in committee, and I shall vote against it here. If there is any good reason, or if any showing can be made by the Senator from Iowa or anyone else, as to why these salaries should be increased $600 a year each, then probably it might change my opinion, but simply to increase them because the judges want more money seems to me an insufficient reason.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, that the committee looked into this question of an increase of the compensation of these judges very carefully. The estimate was $4,000, but the committee concluded that there should be an increase and inserted the amendment, making the salary $3,600.

Mr. BERRY. I did not hear the statement of the Senator in regard to $4,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I say the committee considered this question very carefully. The estimate was $4,000.

Mr. BERRY. The estimate by whom?

Mr. ALLISON. In the regular Book of Estimates. I suppose it began with the judges, probably; I do not know. Under the circumstances, as these judges are very active, busy people, and the business, I am sorry to say, of the police court in this District is constantly increasing, it was deemed that the salary proposed here is a fair and just compensation. I know the Senator from Arkansas objected to the increase, and for reasons satisfactory to himself, but the remainder of the committee, I believe, or at least a majority of the committee, proposed to increase the pay of the judges.

Mr. DANIEL. May I ask the Senator a question? Is the increase here proposed under any existing law, or have the committee put in matters that are not provided for by existing law? If there is a law which provides what these salaries shall be, ought not an amendment of that law to be proposed instead of tacking it on an appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator is possibly right. I think the statutory compensation is only $3,000, but it has been customary, without objection, to change the compensation of public officers. The statutory compensation is $3,000.

Mr. BERRY. Then I submit that the amendment is subject to the point of order if it changes existing law. I make the point of order that it does change existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was under the head of "Courts," on page 51, in line 6, after the word "dollars," to strike out "one deputy clerk, $1,500," and insert "two deputy clerks, at $1,500 each;" in line 8, before the word "deputy," to strike out "three" and insert "two;" in line 10, before the word "dollars," to insert "and thirty-nine;" in line 11, before the word "dollars," to insert "and thirty-nine;" in line 14, before the word "dollars," to strike out "eighteen thousand five hundred" and insert "twenty thousand three hundred and fifty-six;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter each of the judges of said court shall be entitled to six weeks' vacation annually, and that the provision herein made for justices of the peace shall cover the services rendered by such justices of the peace, each of whom shall serve for six weeks as above provided;

So as to make the clause read:

For the police court: For 2 judges, at $3,000 each; compensation of 2 justices of the peace, acting as judges of the police court during the absence of said judges, not exceeding $300 each; clerk, $2,000; 2 deputy clerks, at $1,500 each; 2 deputy clerks, at $1,000 each; 3 bailiffs, at $939 each; 1 deputy marshal, $939; doorkeeper, $540; engineer, $900; janitor, $360; in all, $20,356.

Mr. ALLISON. That total must be changed, in view of the point of order made by the Senator from Arkansas. I move to strike out "twenty thousand three hundred and fifty-six," before the word "dollars," in line 14, and to insert "nineteen thousand one hundred and fifty-six."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 5, to insert:

Defending suits in claims: For defending suits in the United States Court of Claims, $2,000: Provided, That no judgment heretofore or hereafter rendered under the act of June 16, 1880, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of all outstanding claims against the District of Columbia, and conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear the same, and for other purposes," shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury until said judgment shall have been reported to, and specific authority for payment thereof granted by, Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Rock Creek Park," on page 53, line 17, after the word "For," to insert "care and improvement of Rock Creek Park, to be expended under the direction of the board of control of said park, $30,000; and for;" so as to make the clause read:

For care and improvement of Rock Creek Park, to be expended under the direction of the board of control of said park, $30,000; and for the purpose of securing better alignment of boundaries the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the board of control of Rock Creek Park are hereby authorized to adjust and change the boundary between said park and the tract of land near Brightwood, D. C., recently purchased by the District of Columbia for a reservoir site: Provided, That the area of Rock Creek Park shall not be diminished by such adjustment or change.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, after line 17, to strike out.

Reform School for Girls: Superintendent, $1,000; treasurer, $600; matron, $600; two teachers, at $480 each; overseer, $720; four teachers of industries, at $250 each; engineer, $480; assistant engineer, $360; night watchman, $365; laborer, $300; in all, $6,385.

For groceries, provisions, light, fuel, soap, oil, lamps, candles, clothing, shoes, forage, horseshoeing, medicines, medical attendance, hack hire, transportation, labor, sewing machines, fixtures, books, stationery, horses, vehicles, harness, cows, pigs, fowls, sheds, fences, repairs, and other necessary items, $8,000;

For furnishing and equipping new building, $5,000;

In all, $19,385.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 5, after the word "For," to strike out "care of dependent children, under a contract to be made with," and in line 7, after the word "Children," to strike out "by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, not to exceed," and insert "maintenance, including repairs;" so as to make the clause read:

For the National Association for the Relief of Destitute Colored Women and Children, maintenance, including repairs, $9,960.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 12, after the word "For," to strike out "care of dependent children, under a contract to be made with;" in line 13, after the word "Society," to strike out "by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, not to exceed" and insert "maintenance;" so as to make the clause read:

For the Newsboys' and Children's Aid Society, maintenance, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 20, after the word "For," to strike out "support and medical and surgical treatment of patients who are destitute, under a contract to be made with," and in line 22, after the word "Hospital," to strike out "by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, not to exceed" and insert "maintenance;" so as to make the clause read:

For the Children's Hospital, maintenance, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 24, after the word "For," to strike out "support and medical and surgical treatment of patients who are destitute, under a contract to be made with" and, on page 64, line 2, after the word "maintenance," to strike out "by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, not to exceed;" so as to make the clause read:

For the National Homeopathic Hospital Association of Washington, District of Columbia, for maintenance, $8,500.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Iowa if he prefers that the committee amendment shall be acted on before any suggestion of amendment is made to the clause. If so, I will withhold the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I would prefer, if the Senator will allow, that the amendments of the committee shall be acted upon. That course was agreed upon by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. All right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 64, line 5, after the word "for," to strike out "support and medical and surgical treatment of patients who are destitute, under a contract to be made with;" in line 7, after the word "Incurables," to strike out "by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, not to exceed" and insert "maintenance;" and in line 9, before the word "dollars," to insert "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For the Washington Home for Incurables, maintenance, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, after line 9, to insert:

For the Church Orphanage Association of St. John's Parish, maintenance, $1,800.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the amendment is agreed to, I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa why the committee thought it advisable to restore this item to the appropriation bill, which last year or the year before was stricken from the bill and, I think, with the understanding that it was unnecessary and perhaps improper that it should have a place in the bill. I presume the committee have some good reason to give for restoring it to the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire and to the Senate that the people who are in the management of the St. John's Orphanage appeared before the subcommittee of the Senate committee and stated that because of the failure to appropriate last year they had been compelled to reduce the number of children taken care of, and also that for the current year, at least up to this time, there is a considerable deficiency in the maintenance of the orphanage. The committee believed that it was a proper thing for us to give them the sum they have had for several years prior to the current fiscal year. They made such a case as brought the situation fairly within the other appropriations provided for in this bill.

The same is true practically as to St. Joseph's Asylum, which is the next item. The committee believed that these two cases were exceptional and ought to be provided for. Of course it is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not going to make any factious opposition to this amendment, because I do not believe it will be in the bill when it is finally agreed to, but it surprises me to see a great and rich church, one of the greatest and richest churches in the District of Columbia, asking Congress for the paltry appropriation of $1,800 to help carry on their work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the pending appropriation bill. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, so far as the next item is concerned, I know little about it beyond the fact that that likewise was excluded from the last appropriation bill, I think, and is now restored. Of course these worthy people want whatever money they can get for their work. If they can not get it from private subscription, they want to get it from Congress. Everybody in this District does want to get some money from Congress if it possibly can be obtained.

I have been looking up one or two facts in connection with this matter during the last hour. I want to call attention to the fact that we have an institution in the District that we partly support, called the District of Columbia Industrial Home School. The report of the superintendent for that school shows that there are now empty rooms in that building and two dormitories that will accommodate a considerably larger number of children than are now in that institution. In other words, the capacity of an institution that we are supporting, and properly supporting, is not full by any means; and yet we are appropriating money to other institutions to take care of these children.

When I turn to the report of the superintendent of charities of the District I find that he has some very pronounced ideas in regard to this matter. He says:

For the Board of Children's Guardians an increase of $1,500 is estimated in the fund for administrative purposes. This is to cover the expense of supervision of 200 children added to the number under the guardianship of the board, but residing in the homes of persons to whom they are indentured or apprenticed. One hundred were added to this number during 1899, and it is expected that an equal or larger number will be added during 1900. Certainly $7.50 per child per year is a small enough estimate for this service.

I understand that under the direction of the superintendent of charities in this District there is no difficulty in getting all the white children that are a charge upon the public Treasury in some form or other put in good homes and cared for, where they are taught certain useful occupations, and it costs the board only seven dollars and a half each to get them so placed; and if I am correctly informed there is no difficulty in getting homes for all those boys especially. Then in regard to the general proposition the superintendent says:

Five child-caring institutions were dropped from the list of those receiving public assistance for 1900. Three of these have asked that they be restored to their former places in the appropriation bill. There is no public reason why these requests should be granted. The public agencies for the care of dependent children in the District are able, and in most respects well equipped, to take care of all the children who would otherwise be received by the institutions which seek the restoration of their appropriations. The Government has laid upon them no duty or responsibility in the premises, and they have therefore no equitable claim upon the Government for support. If they continue to care for children for whom the public agencies would otherwise care, they will do so in obedience to their own desires and upon their own responsibility.

Those, Mr. President, are the words of the superintendent of charities of the District of Columbia, in which he enters a very emphatic protest against the proposed appropriation in these two items in the District appropriation bill.

Now, Mr. President, that is all I care to say about the matter. I am satisfied that if those two items should again find a place in the bill others will follow, and that pretty nearly every institution of that kind in the city, especially those connected with the churches of the city, will come here asking for some help. But if the Committee on Appropriations have in their wisdom looked this matter over carefully and have concluded that it is their duty and that a public benefit can be subserved by these appropriations, I certainly shall not enter any factious opposition to them. However, I will venture to express the hope that when the bill is finally matured these items will not appear in it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 64, after line 11, to insert:

For St. Joseph's Asylum, maintenance, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, after line 13, to insert:

For the care, maintenance, and instruction of the indigent blind who are actually residents of the District of Columbia, $5,000, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to modify the amendment on page 64, line 14, by striking out the word "indigent."

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Militia of the District of Columbia," on page 65, line 7, to increase the appropriation for cleaning and repairing uniforms, arms, and equipments, and contingent expenses, from $700 to $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, after line 15, to insert:

For pay of troops, other than Government employees, to be disbursed under the direction of the commanding general, $17,600: Provided, That members of the National Guard of the District of Columbia who receive compensation for their services as such shall not be held or construed to be officers of the United States, or persons holding any place of trust or profit, or discharging any official function under or in connection with any Executive Department of the Government of the United States within the provision of section 5498 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON. We passed over one item which I desire to have amended. On page 7, line 22, I move to strike out the word "two," before "hundred," and insert "four;" so as to read:

Street sweeping office: For superintendent, $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 8, line 4, I move to strike out the amendment already inserted, "seven," and insert "nine;" so as to make the total for the street sweeping office read:

In all, $24,900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill. I gave notice of a proposed amendment to the bill providing for an appropriation of $2,000 for the Woman's Clinic. It went to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and I was directed by that committee to report it back favorably and send it to the Committee on Appropriations, which I have to confess I neglected to do. But I explained to the committee in the presence of the chairman that my instructions were that I might do so. I think I will have to say that I had reason to believe when I presented the matter to the committee that some appropriation would be made for this worthy purpose.

I have not the data before me at the present moment concerning the Woman's Clinic in the District of Columbia, but I will say that it is a charity where women have practical work in surgery, and it is, I think, wholly in charge of a staff composed of women physicians, with some of the most eminent members of the profession in the city as consulting physicians. They treat women, especially the surgical diseases of women, and infants under 5 years of age. They have never had an appropriation from the public Treasury. They have raised their money by private contribution, and, of course, have had some pay patients. They are now, as I understand the matter, a little in debt. They have plans for enlarging this charity.

I have very great sympathy for an institution of this kind. I think we ought to encourage women who have prepared themselves for medical and surgical practice to have an opportunity of establishing an institution of this kind in the District of Columbia.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to insist that they ought to have as an initial appropriation $2,000, but I will ask the Senator from Iowa if he has any objection to inserting an amendment at the end of line 19, page 63, reading as follows:

For the Woman's Clinic, maintenance, $1,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], representing the Committee on the District of Columbia, sent this matter to the Committee on Appropriations, but in the final adjustment of the bill respecting these charities the committee did not feel that we had such information as would justify us in reporting in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator. I shall not, however, object to the insertion of $1,000, as proposed by the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, I will offer the amendment, and I will say that I appreciate very much the courtesy of the Senator from Iowa. I will promise him that during the time this matter is in conference I will see that the friends of this charity shall furnish the committee of conference with further information than they now have concerning the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 63, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

For the Woman's Clinic, maintenance, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to come in on page 60, after line 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 15, on page 60, it is proposed to insert:

For the purchase by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of not to exceed 10 acres of land in the District of Columbia for a municipal hospital, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President, this hospital is needed as much as anything in the District of Columbia. It has been recommended by the joint committee of the two Houses of Congress appointed to look into the hospital and charity matters of the District of Columbia. It has been recommended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, by medical experts, and by the Committee on the District of Columbia. As a preliminary step to the erection of the hospital the land proposed to be purchased is necessary. I think we ought to make this appropriation at this time. There are large numbers of patients applying to be permitted even to sleep on the floors of the Washington Asylum Hospital on account of the want of accommodations. This hospital is intended to take care of chronic cases. I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations understands as well as I do the great necessity of doing something in this direction, and I hope he will accept the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in connection with the amendment, I desire simply to say that I sat with the Senator who has just spoken, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, during a hearing on this subject, and was profoundly impressed with the opinion that a hospital for municipal purposes was one of the crying necessities of this District. I will further add that recently I visited the Washington Asylum, which is the only institution in this city that can possibly be called a municipal hospital, and I found there an overcrowded condition that is not to the credit of the District of Columbia. Beside that, the hospital is located almost on the edge of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, a place where human beings ought not to be compelled to spend an hour of their time, even if they are criminals. It is a malarial and unhealthy portion of the city, and certainly has no adaptation whatever to a site for hospital purposes. I feel very deeply impressed with the necessity for this proposed addition to the hospitals of Washington; and I may add that I think the committee of medical experts who visited this city for the purpose of examining our hospitals recommended that an institution of this kind should be constructed. They were physicians, I think, from Philadelphia and perhaps New York, and I feel sure that this is one of the appropriations that ought to be immediately made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The physicians referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire were Dr. Hurd, superintendent of the Johns Hopkins University Hospital, and Dr. Chapin, superintendent of the Philadelphia Hospital for the Insane. They recommended the creation of this hospital after very thoroughly examining the hospitals of the District.

Mr. ALLISON. There is no municipal hospital in this city. The committee looked into this question as far as they could, and concurred with the people of the District of Columbia that a municipal hospital would be necessary here at some time.

The almshouse, alluded to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], is, I agree, quite unfit for hospital purposes; but there were so many more urgent things pressing upon the Committee on Appropriations, and in view of the large appropriations for sewers, water, and other like purposes, the committee did not feel that they could enter into the question of purchasing ground for a municipal hospital at this session, especially when the amount is so large. But in view of the strong urgency on behalf of the hospital by the Committee on the District of Columbia, I shall make no objection to its insertion, and shall submit the question to the consideration of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in on page 21.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, after the word "dollars," in line 3, it is proposed to insert:

For grading and paving Connecticut avenue (extended) between Columbia road and Kalorama avenue, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In consequence of that amendment, the total appropriation should be changed on page 22, line 5, by adding $25,000.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the total in line 5, on page 22, so as to read: "$176,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 9, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

For the purchase of lot 12, block 8, in Commissioners' subdivision of Washington Heights, so as to cause the public park on Eighteenth street extended to front on Eighteenth street, $11,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the letter which I send to the desk may be inserted in the RECORD in connection with the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be inserted in the RECORD in the absence of objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER COMMISSIONER OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, April 9, 1900.

SENATOR: In reply to your inquiry of this date concerning lot 12, block 8, Commissioners' subdivision of Washington Heights, I would state that the lot is somewhat triangular in shape, being 63 feet deep at its south end, 10 feet deep at its north end, and fronting 200 feet on Eighteenth street. It lies between the ground owned by the United States and used for the purpose of the Champlain avenue shaft to the tunnel and Eighteenth street. It completely blocks access from said ground to Eighteenth street.

The lot immediately back of the sidewalk is 2 feet above the grade of the sidewalk. It can be considered, however, as being practically all on grade throughout its entire area.

It is understood that parties are endeavoring to purchase the lot for the purpose of erecting an apartment house upon it. This would block the entire frontage of the park, against which the house would abut in the rear. It is believed that this should be prevented, if possible, as a matter of public policy.

A portion of the park next to Champlain avenue is below grade, and when the work of construction on the aqueduct tunnel is completed it will have to be regraded; but this can be done at very slight expense, and will then afford a good grade between Eighteenth street and Champlain avenue, which borders the park on the east.

The acquirement of the lot in question will cause the park to abut, for its entire length, upon Eighteenth street.

Very respectfully, yours,

LANSING H. BEACH,
Captain, Corps of Engineers, United States Army,
Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

Hon. W. E. CHANDLER,
United States Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend, on page 56, by striking out lines 14 and 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend, on page 56, after line 13, by striking out:

For continuing erection of a workhouse for males, $50,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. That will throw the subject into conference, I will suggest to the Senator from Iowa. I do not believe that that appropriation ought to be made, but I will say no more on the subject if the Senator from Iowa is willing to take it into conference.

Mr. ALLISON. This appropriation is for continuing the erection of a workhouse at the Washington Asylum. Last year we appropriated $50,000 for this purpose, and authorized a contract to be made for its completion, limiting the cost to $100,000. I submit to the Senator that this is only in pursuance of the arrangement of last year.

Mr. CHANDLER. If that is so, the committee of conference will find it out. I will change the motion by moving to strike out the word "fifty," before "thousand," in line 14, and to insert "ten;" so as to make the appropriation $10,000. Then the Senator can ascertain whether it is necessary to any existing contract to appropriate $50,000. I shall not detain the Senate, because I know the Senator is anxious to get the bill through and go away. I will not undertake to present the views on this subject of the board of trade, because I have confidence that the committee of conference will do what the obligations of the Government require and what on the whole is best, as they always do.

Mr. ALLISON. I will compromise with the Senator. If he will make the amount $40,000 instead of $50,000, we shall then have the matter before the conference.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; but it will be before the conference just as surely with $10,000 as $40,000, if the Senator will allow me to say so. I do not want to debate the question.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be very glad to hear the reasons the board of trade gives why this workhouse for people who are condemned to the workhouse in the District of Columbia should not be completed as provided for. If they have reasons for it which are sufficient to the Senator, I shall be glad to hear them.

Mr. CHANDLER. That opens the whole question that I did not want to open in order to detain the bill, but out here, not a great way east of the Capitol, are these three institutions—the jail, the workhouse, and the almshouse. They are inconveniently near; the burial lot is close by, and there is a feeling on the part of citizens of Washington, who are entitled to be heard, that at no very distant day the workhouse certainly ought to be taken 2 or 3 miles away, and not be in such close proximity to the Capitol.

The Senator understands the question perfectly well, better than I do; though I sometimes wonder that he remembers everything that he has occasion to know about appropriation bills, and has been able to carry them so many years in his mind. The Senator knows the merits of this question, and he knows there is a fair argument in favor of arresting the extension of the workhouse right where it is if it can be done consistently with existing contracts.

Mr. President, if the sum is reduced to $10,000, the Senator will have the whole range from $10,000 to $50,000 to consider in the conference committee; and that will save me the necessity of expounding this subject at greater length.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be very glad to hear from the Senator further upon this subject. I regard this as so important that I can not consent to a large reduction of the amount. I have here the report of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. They certainly ought to be familiar with the views of the board of trade and other people who study these subjects.

Mr. CHANDLER. But there is an appeal, as the Senator knows, from the District Commissioners to the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I know; but not to the board of trade.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator assumes that if the board of trade differ with the District Commissioners, the views of the board of trade are to have no weight.

Mr. ALLISON. No; I do not assume that. I assume that the District Commissioners are supposed to investigate the different public institutions in this city; and the Commissioners say in their report of this year as follows:

> The need of a new building is most imperative, and it is to be hoped that good progress will be made on the portion appropriated for, and that a like sum will be promptly appropriated for a further extension of the new building, and a steel-cell system provided for.

Mr. President, it is possible that at some future time the 40 acres of land in the District of Columbia which the Government of the United States owns in this particular place will be needed and used for other purposes, and that we may be required to go farther out into the country to establish an almshouse, a workhouse, etc.; but I submit that that will not be in the very near future, and that this workhouse is absolutely needed here for that class of inmates who are from time to time assigned there by the courts. I prefer that the suggestion made by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and agreed to by the House of Representatives, shall stand in the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa conveyed a wrong impression in his first statement.

Mr. ALLISON. I did.

Mr. CHANDLER. He conveyed the impression that $50,000 was necessary to carry out the existing contract for the extension.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to make that correction. It is for a new wing that this appropriation is proposed to be made.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator unintentionally created a different impression. I do not object to the fulfillment of existing contracts, but the Senator admits now that in these two lines of the bill there is a provision for a further extension beyond the one already contracted for. It is exactly that further extension which I wish to provide against, and I certainly think it is not unreasonable to have the Senator confer with the House committee, not as to whether existing contracts shall be fulfilled, but as to whether $40,000 more shall be expended. I will modify my motion by moving to strike out "fifty" and insert "ten," so as to make the appropriation $10,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire. [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to prevail.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall have to see if I can not convince more of the voters in the affirmative, if I have not succeeded in convincing the Senator from Iowa. I appeal to the Senator again to let this amendment be made. The matter will then still be entirely within his control and the control of the committee of conference.

Mr. ALLISON. I am willing that the appropriation may be reduced to $40,000 with a view to any examination we can make as respects the necessity for this appropriation either in the other House or in conference.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator a question on that point. The Senator knows how much it will require to fulfill the existing contracts. If it is $10,000, no more need be appropriated. But when the bill goes into conference, if no amendment is made as to this provision, the House committee will say that it has been a decision of the Senate to grant this further extension of the workhouse; then the question will not be open in conference, and I want to have open in conference the whole question whether or not this recommendation of the District Commissioners for a new and additional extension of the workhouse beyond that now provided by law shall be made. The Senator knows whether the whole question will be in conference or not.

Mr. ALLISON. The $50,000 appropriated is already under contract in building one wing of this workhouse. The Commissioners, when they were before the Senate committee, insisted upon this additional $50,000 in order that they might complete another wing of the workhouse. Therefore it is not necessary that this appropriation shall be made to complete the wings already contracted for, as I understand now from the testimony, having refreshed my memory in regard to the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no need, then, of any additional money, as I understand the Senator?

Mr. ALLISON. For that particular wing.

Mr. CHANDLER. To fulfill existing contracts?

Mr. ALLISON. I think not.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, then, Mr. President, I certainly hope the Senate will not decide to still further enlarge the workhouse. I will read some extracts on that point from the report of the committee on charities and corrections of the board of trade. They say:

> This District of Columbia, the seat of government of our great nation, has at the close of the first century of its existence a jail, workhouse, and almshouse system far behind what a city of the size and character of Washington ought to have.
> PRESENT SITE UNFIT FOR PRESENT USES.
> These three institutions, under the control of two different branches of the Government, are located close to each other, directly east of the Capitol, and so located that they have long blocked the way to improvement and growth in that direction of our city. It is only a question of a few years when every interest, including (1) the growth of the city eastward and the extension of its streets; (2) economical administration, and (3) the health of officers and employees and of the hundreds if not thousands of the wards and inmates maintained and confined therein, will be compelled to unite in the effort to secure the removal of these institutions from the site now occupied by them.
>
> The estimates submitted for the current fiscal year by the management of one of these institutions include a sum of $30,782.80 for the purchase of three additional squares, bringing these unfortunates so much nearer the Capitol building, and so much the more blocking the eastward extension of streets, which without these institutions would long since have been prosperous thoroughfares and the site of many private residences. It should never be forgotten that a century ago the more desirable section of the new nation's new home was not west but eastward of the Capitol and extending to the river on the east, then navigable as far as Bladensburg, which section, when the Anacostia flats are reclaimed, will again be recognized as in every way fitted for residential use and made proportionately valuable.
> UNANIMOUS RECOMMENDATIONS.
> Your committee therefore unanimously recommend that at as early a day as possible the authorities of the District government be requested by the Board of Trade to formulate jointly a plan for—
>
> 1. The ultimate removal from their present sites of the jail, the workhouse, and the almshouse, with their respective necessary adjuncts of potter's field, isolated wards, etc.
>
> 2. A plan for the separation of the administration of these three institutions.
>
> 3. The location of each on a site specially adapted for its needs, to the end that each one of these necessary institutions can, at a minimum of cost and annoyance to the community, perform the maximum of service not only now required of each, respectively, but so located as will enable them in coming years to grow with the certain growth of the national capital.
>
> Your committee believes that the entire cost of the changes in location herein recommended and the erection of all needed structures can be more than met by the proceeds of the sale of land now occupied by these institutions.

PROTEST AGAINST FURTHER EXPENDITURE ON PRESENT SITE.

The extent of the present obstruction to the natural growth of our city in an eastward direction will be shown by a map prepared under the direction of the District authorities and submitted with this. To have this needless obstruction prolonged by the expenditure of vast sums of money for the purchase of additional land and the erection of additional structures for these institutions on their present site your committee believes to be unwise from every point of view, and your committee would here record unanimous and most earnest protest against this unwise use of public funds.

WORKHOUSE BADLY PLACED.

The workhouse, under the control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, should be removed north and eastward a mile or more, along one of the to-be-in-the-future extended avenues in the extreme northeastern section of the District, where the inmates could be given appropriate employment in laying out projected and sadly need thoroughfares in that section, thoroughfares that will more than repay to the District taxpayers the cost of maintenance of these visitants to the national capital, the number of whom seems to increase with the years, and to many of whom employment would be a great benefit.

The Senator from Iowa recognizes the fact that the probability is that at some time in the future the almshouse, and perhaps the jail, will be removed farther away from the Capitol than where they are now located. If that probability exists, and if we are now finishing an extension of the workhouse, I think we had better complete that extension, and not authorize another one.

I do not say that there should not be jails and almshouses, nor that they should not be in reasonable proximity to the Capitol of the nation; but they will be near enough if they are taken 2 or 3 or 4 or 5 miles out into the country. They are not wanted in this portion of the city, which is needed for residential uses. Therefore I hope, upon my statement and upon the admissions of the Senator from Iowa, the Senate will strike out this clause and will let the subject go into conference, where the able and intelligent and all-wise committee of conference can see whether it is best to put any more money into these almshouses so near to the Capitol, and whether the potter's field, in which hundreds and hundreds of people are from year to year being buried, should not be moved farther out into the country and more distant from the thickly settled portions of the beautiful city of Washington.

Mr. President, I renew my original motion, and move to strike out the whole paragraph. I hope the Senator from Iowa will do me the courtesy, as he will still retain a great deal more control over it than I, to let it go into conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, after line 13, it is proposed to strike out:

For continuing erection of a workhouse for males, $50,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the "noes" have it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very reluctantly, I shall have to ask a division unless the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I regard this proposition as so important that I can not consent to strike it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question on the amendment. Senators in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted——

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that no further count will be asked by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is no judgment of the Senate when three or four vote one way and six people, not so wise as the three or four, vote the other way. Therefore if the Senator is not willing to take this matter into conference, and wants the absolute judgment of the Senate upon it, we had better have a quorum present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Gear,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Allison,	Hale,	Martin,	Shoup,
Bard,	Hanna,	Money,	Simon,
Bate,	Hansbrough,	Morgan,	Stewart,
Berry,	Harris,	Nelson,	Taliaferro,
Burrows,	Hawley,	Penrose,	Teller,
Butler,	Heitfeld,	Perkins,	Tillman,
Carter,	Hoar,	Pettigrew,	Turley,
Chandler,	Jones of Nev.	Pettus,	Vest,
Fairbanks,	Kean,	Platt of N. Y.	Wellington,
Forsker,	Kenney,	Rawlings,	Wolcott.
Frye,	Lindsay,	Ross,
Gallinger,	McBride,	Scott,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty Senators have responded to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 14 and 15, on page 56, as follows:

For continuing erection of a workhouse for males, $50,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will read again the portion of the report which the Senator from Iowa read:

The need of a new building is most imperative, and it is to be hoped that good progress will be made on the portion appropriated for, and that a like sum will be promptly appropriated for a further extension of the new building, and a steel-cell system provided for.

The $50,000 is for "a further extension of the new building and a steel-cell system provided for." I am not going to detain the Senate, now that there are one or two beyond half of the membership present, to discuss the question any further, if the Senate chooses to adopt this provision. The Senator from Iowa admits that the almshouse probably ought to be removed farther away from the Capitol, and that eventually it will be done. I am sure it will be done, and I believe, therefore, that in order to avoid the expenditure of $50,000 during the next year, which is to be thrown away whenever the removal of the almshouse is made, the amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, as I understand this controversy, the Senator from New Hampshire wishes the almshouse removed because he wants the locality for residences for the citizens of Washington, and the other Senator from New Hampshire wants it removed because the locality is so unhealthful that it is not a fit place for the residence of convicts. It seems to me both reasons are exceedingly good.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After line 6, on page 20, it is proposed to insert:

For grading and regulating Quincy street, Petworth, from Brightwood avenue to Eighth street, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that there is an unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut (to Mr. HALE). Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be laid aside temporarily. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation, under the management of the Navy Department, of a Pacific cable.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I agreed to yield for a moment to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. ROSS], who wishes to present a matter which will not take up much time.

CIVIL OFFICES IN OUTLYING DEPENDENCIES.

Mr. ROSS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2000) regulating appointments to and removals from civil offices in outlying dependencies of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read in full for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, which had been reported from the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all appointments to civil offices made by the President or any head of a Department in Alaska, Hawaii, or any place brought within the jurisdiction of the United States by the recent treaty with Spain, shall be made irrespective of the political opinions of the persons appointed, and, so far as consistent with the proper performance of the duties of the office, in such a manner as to represent the entire country. In case of removal from any such office, whenever practicable, charges shall be made in writing and a copy thereof furnished to the accused, who shall be afforded reasonable opportunity to make answer thereto; and the President or head of a Department making the appointment may, wherever the public interest shall seem to require it, suspend the official pending hearing or investigation of such charges.

Mr. GALLINGER. I feel constrained to object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

WINSLOW WARREN.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask for the passage of a bill which I think will not take two minutes?

Mr. HALE. I will if it will not give rise to debate.

Mr. HOAR. I am sure it will not.

Mr. HALE. I yield for the moment.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 248) for the relief of Winslow Warren.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Winslow Warren $500 for services rendered to the United States in 1893 and 1894 as commissioner, at the request of the judge of the United States circuit court for the district of Massachusetts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

HIRAM JOHNSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. BATE. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Tennessee has appealed to me, and I yield on the assurance that the bill which he wishes to have considered will not lead to debate. I wish to get the other bill through this afternoon.

Mr. BATE. I do not think it will. If it does I will withdraw it. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2356) for the relief of Hiram Johnson and others.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PACIFIC CABLE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2) to provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation, under the management of the Navy Department, of a Pacific cable, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That to the end of establishing hereafter, whenever desirable, telegraph communication between the United States and the Philippine Islands and Japan under the waters of the Pacific Ocean there shall be constructed, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Navy, a submarine telegraphic cable or cables, and connecting land lines, from the city of San Francisco, Cal., to the city of Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, over such route as may be deemed by the Secretary of the Navy to be most practicable.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to cause such further surveys and soundings to be made as may be necessary to determine the most practicable route upon which to establish cable communication connecting the cities of San Francisco and Honolulu, and to obtain, by concession, lease, or purchase, such lands and rights therein as may be requisite for the establishment of proper terminal stations, and for the right of way on the Pacific coast or upon any of the islands touched by the cables hereinbefore authorized.

SEC. 3. That if it shall appear that the work of laying said cable herein authorized, or any portion of such work, can be expeditiously, conveniently, and economically performed by vessels of the Navy, their employment for such purpose is authorized, and such changes in the naval vessels so employed as can be advantageously and economically made in order to fit them for such work may be made: Provided, however, That if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, it is more advantageous to the public interests, the vessels, and the equipments thereof necessary to carry on the work of laying said cable may be obtained by charter from any source.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby empowered, immediately upon the passage of this act, to cause to be prepared plans and specifications, to solicit proposals by suitable advertisement, and to enter into contract or contracts for the construction, laying, and equipment of said lines of telegraphic cable, at the earliest practicable date; such contract to include the furnishing of all necessary materials, instruments, appliances, and appurtenances, and the performance of all work necessary to the laying and complete equipment and successful operation of said cable, except such materials and articles as can be more advantageously furnished, and such work as can be more efficiently performed by the Navy. Contracts for materials, articles, or labor, connected with the establishment of the cable shall be governed by provisions of existing law relating to public contracts: Provided, That the wires, cables, insulators, batteries, instruments, and all other materials and appurtenances shall be of such quality as to insure the satisfactory maintenance and efficient operation of said cables; and no inferior materials, instruments, batteries, or other appliances or work shall be accepted or paid for under any contract made under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 5. That the cable, wires, and other instruments, materials, appliances, and appurtenances necessary in the work of laying said cable shall be of American manufacture: Provided, That the same can be procured at a cost not exceeding 12 per cent above what the same can be procured for in foreign markets.

SEC. 6. That when the cable herein authorized is completed, the operation and control thereof shall be transferred to the Postmaster-General, who shall have authority to receive and transmit messages in the interests of commerce and the public, shall establish rates of toll therefor, and shall arrange and provide for the transmission of messages from news associations and agencies to the newspapers of the United States, commonly known as press messages, at a suitable reduction from the rates established for ordinary private messages.

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster-General shall establish a fund to be known as the "Pacific cable fund," into which all receipts derived from the revenues of the cable shall be deposited, and the net proceeds over and above operating expenses derived therefrom shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 8. That for the purpose of carrying this act into effect the sum of $3,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HALE. The bill as reported is a substitute for the original bill referred to the committee, and I ask that it may be considered as the original bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator having this bill in charge if there are any American manufacturers of cable for use in deep sea? I have been informed that it is a question whether there are.

Mr. HALE. Of course that was the question, whether any American company can build the cable in competition with manufacturers in foreign countries.

Mr. STEWART. That is, the cable.

Mr. HALE. Build it and lay it. The committee were in sympathy with the American manufacturers who appeared before the committee and assured the committee that, as has proved true in other branches of industry in which the Government is interested—the building of ships and ordnance and matters of that kind—they could, by giving proper time, produce plant enough to furnish it, but that a discrimination ought to be made in their favor; and the committee, recognizing that, have put into the bill a discrimination of 12½ per cent in favor of American manufacturers.

Mr. STEWART. Is that sufficient?

Mr. HALE. That is a question. Nobody can say. Some of the testimony which the committee had indicated that that was enough, and some of it indicated that it was not quite enough. The committee settled upon that finally, and there is that discrimination.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question. I did not hear the colloquy which has been going on. What are the estimates for the cable?

Mr. HALE. About $3,000,000. It can not be stated exactly.

Mr. SEWELL. The original bill contained an appropriation of $11,000,000 for a cable to the Philippines.

Mr. HALE. The committee has deemed it wise to go no further at present than to provide for a cable to the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. SEWELL. And $3,000,000 is to be the cost of it?

Mr. HALE. That is the basis of the estimate of cost. After this is built—and it ought to be built and built speedily; everybody says that—then the question will come up about extending the cable farther. The committee concluded not to go into that question, all the more because there is a question whether with the cable laid and operating to Honolulu it is not cheaper and better to build from Seattle or San Francisco northward by the Alaskan islands to Japanese territory. Therefore the committee deemed it wise, and I think it was a very wise conclusion, not at present to embark on that question. That is all left for determination hereafter.

Mr. SEWELL. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I move to strike out the fifth section of the bill. We know that the people of the United States have to contribute under our tariff taxation and otherwise to manufacturers, and we have been submitting to it patiently or impatiently for a hundred years or more. But I for one am not willing that the Government itself shall be taxed on its own business for the same purpose. It seems to me to be an absurdity that the Government should be taxed twelve and a half per cent for the benefit of men who make iron or who make the materials necessary to build a cable. We know that we need iron to clothe our ships and we know that we are contributing a bounty of about $300 per ton for that purpose. We all know that, and the Government is forced to submit to it; but why should the Government itself willingly submit to be taxed on its own business for the benefit of manufacturers?

Mr. President, it is an absurdity. It is a thing that ought not to be tolerated. Even if you do unjustly tax the citizens, do not impose upon the Government a burden of this sort.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will not take up any of the time of the Senate. I am very desirous of passing the bill and getting it out of the way of the Senator from Massachusetts. The committee heard American manufacturers, who are very desirous of having a chance at this work as other American establishments have had in other Government work, and the committee believed that American iron and American steel, Alabama steel, could be utilized in this wire if we made a discrimination of only twelve and a half per cent. Unless a Senator desires to debate the question, in order to get the matter out of the way I will move to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Maine withdraw the motion for a moment?

Mr. HALE. I withdraw it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs I will state for the information of the Senate that the Democratic members of the committee all agred to this proposition as a compromise to keep a larger discrimination or tariff or bounty, or whatever you may term it, from being imposed. While we disagree in this Chamber as to the protection of American industries against foreign competition, I think a sound public policy warrants the assertion that it is to the best interests of the people of the Unsted States as a whole to manufacture anything in this country that we need to use, if it can be done.

While I am not a protectionist in any sense and am opposed to subsidies of every kind, and while I believe the American manufacturer can compete and does compete in the markets of the world with his competitors in iron manufacture, and I know that we of the South are competing in cotton manufacture, and while there are a great many iniquities and outrages in our tariff policy that ought not to exist, I for one consented to the proposition that in this experiment of a Government cable laid by the Navy Department, a Department of the Government, as an experiment in Government ownership and control of one of the avenues of commerce, the job should be given to American cable makers, if they were willing to invest their money and put us on a basis of equality with European manufacturers in having in this country such a plant.

It is true I smelt, I thought, some little odor of another armor manufacturing establishment, which we subsidized some years ago, but we did not put any percents on that. We simply declared in bald terms that the armor should be of American manufacture, and turned around and made a contract with the steel companies to give them a price for the armor enough to pay for the extra outlay, and have since been paying tribute to those people by paying the same price, or approximately the same price, on all succeeding contracts to the first contract which we gave, which I thought an outrage and which the Senate has three or four times declared to be an outrageous imposition on the Government.

We are now face to face with a proposition coming here from the other end of the Capitol to continue to pay the tribute which the armor factories have levied upon the Government. But this is an entirely different proposition. I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Alabama that it is altogether likely that Alabama iron will go into the manufacture of this cable, because he knows that Alabama now makes iron cheaper than Pennsylvania can make it. She is preparing to make steel cheaper. While it might be objectionable to have the United States pay 12 per cent to the American manufacturers of cables, there are other products besides iron which enter into their construction. The skilled labor necessary to have this industry of cable making get a foothold in this country may need this amount of protection. If it needs it, let us give it to it, with the hope that in the near future this baby which we are now going to give a sucking bottle to will get on its feet so that it can lay cables in competition with Europe, and not have any further protection or subsidy, and be able hereafter to compete without any assistance.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I want to say most emphatically that up to this date Alabama is not willing to accept the bribe.

Mr. TILLMAN. I did not offer any bribe.

Mr. PETTUS. I do not know when it will be otherwise, because I see a movement on foot in that direction. I have seen a very great State close to us accept the sugar bottle.

Mr. President, this thing is wrong in itself. The Senator from South Carolina has illustrated the whole principle of the thing by offering this dish to Alabama on a silver plate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon, if he will permit me. I have not offered to Alabama anything. I am calling attention to the fact that Alabama's industries of iron are struggling in competition with other industries in this country; and while there may be no help to Alabama in this, it is nevertheless true that if we can get an armor factory in Alabama established by the Government south of the Potomac, so that that section of the country can have it demonstrated that it can make armor cheaper than it can be made in any other part of the United States, I for one will be glad to see some money spent in the South. We have been sending money North all the time and have never got any back.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, the great-grandchildren of the Senator from South Carolina will some of them be here in the Senate before any armor-plate manufactory is ever built in Alabama on this plan. So far as struggling for position in the production of iron and coal, Alabama is not struggling at all; it is master of the situation both as to iron and coal.

Mr. President, we ought not to do this thing. Oh, if I had lived long enough where these great benefits have been conferred, I expect I would be a millionaire to-day and see very clearly, as clearly as the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] sees, that it is all right. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am glad that the Senator sees in Alabama signs of a change, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. Due to our policy.

Mr. ALDRICH. Due to our policy.

Mr. PETTUS. I am afraid that the time will come; it has not come yet, but we are on this downward road, this greed for wealth, these logical deductions that we are able to make, or, as the Senator from Rhode Island makes so clearly, that every man is benefited to the same degree you raise the taxes on him except these manufacturers themselves. We can very easily see that the income of such people ought not to be taxed; it would diminish their great wealth; but the fellows who have it not, walk on them as much as you please, they may kick and quarrel, but they can not pour their millions into the election fund. Therefore let them kick.

Mr. President, it ought not to be. Senators know it is wrong; but by the logic of New England and the adjacent States, especially Rhode Island, which is at the present moment head center of this protective-tariff argument——

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. TELLER. He means the Rhode Island Senators.

Mr. PETTUS. Rhode Island, if their voice could control, would, but they could not do it entirely; New England will be heard, and will control, too. If the Senator from Rhode Island, or his people, could control this whole subject, Rhode Island would be protected and the balance of us would be out in the cold. Rhode Island has, therefore, to form an alliance, and they form it with Maine. From Rhode Island to Maine are the most favored parts of the United States.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PETTUS. It does not produce it all, but it gets it all after it is produced.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not insist on calling the yeas and nays on his amendment, as the Senate is thin. I ask the Chair to put the motion to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. HALE. Let the vote be taken directly on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. PETTUS. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. All right.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD]. He is not in the Chamber, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator of Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. I do not see him present, and I will withhold my vote. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. ALDRICH. He would vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Virginia can vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN. I vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GEAR].

Mr. QUARLES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TURLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BERRY. My colleague [Mr. JONES of Arkansas] is absent. I think he has a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], but I am not sure.

Mr. HALE (after having voted in the negative). Yes. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] and let my vote stand.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am informed that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON] would vote "nay" if present, and therefore I will vote; I vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. He is not present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and as I do not see him present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have a pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TURLEY] has a pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. We have transferred those pairs so that we may vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TURLEY. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Bate,	Heitfeld,	Pettus,	Turley,

So Mr. PETTUS's amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2355) in relation to the suppression of insurrection in, and to the government of, the Philippine Islands, ceded by Spain to the United States by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask for the consideration of Senate bill No. 3211.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before the Senator goes on with that bill, I ask him to allow me one moment in regard to the unfinished business. I gave notice last week that to-day at 2 o'clock, when the unfinished business should be laid before the Senate, I would ask the Senate to fix a time for taking a vote upon it. Owing to a delay of the train I was unable to get here at that time, and I would like to make the request now that a time may be fixed for the taking of the vote on Senate bill No. 2355, the present unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. I object to any unanimous consent that a vote shall be taken on that bill at a particular time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut is recognized.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HARTFORD, CONN.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask leave to call up Senate bill 3211, and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, and that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for that purpose. The bill will be read to the Senate for its information.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not object, of course, to the Senator's request, but I shall ask unanimous consent after that bill is disposed of that I may submit some remarks in reference to the United States Naval Observatory.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 3211) to authorize the construction of an addition to the public building at Hartford, Conn.; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to construct an addition to the public building at Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, to contain necessary heating and lighting equipment; said addition to be constructed in general conformity with the present building: Provided, That the city of Hartford shall convey to the United States, without expense to the United States, and in form acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, such additional land as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be necessary to secure a proper site for said addition: And provided further, That such addition shall be constructed at a cost not to exceed $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have an amendment to offer to the body of the bill, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 2, after the word "further," strike out the word "That" and insert the following:

The plans, specifications, and estimates shall be made and approved according to law, and.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed,

PUBLIC BUILDING AT ALLENTOWN, PA.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1992) for the erection of a public building at Allentown, Pa.

The Secretary read the bill; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices, in the city of Allentown and State of Pennsylvania, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $153,000.

SEC. 2. That proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

SEC. 3. That proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to said proposed sites.

SEC. 4. That if, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites, and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after said examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all maps, statements, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

SEC. 5. That the compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

SEC. 6. That the building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CARTHAGE, MO.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 619, being the bill (S. 3309) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Carthage, in the State of Missouri.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 1, on page 2, after the word "hundred," to insert "and twelve;" and in line 2, after the word "thousand," to insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Carthage and State of Missouri, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $112,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 14, to strike out:

No money shall be used for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Missouri shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT RENO, NEV.

Mr. STEWART. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 182.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 182) for the erection of a public building in Reno, Nev.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices in the city of Reno, State of Nevada, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $70,000.

SEC. 2. That proposals for the sale of land suitable for said site shall be invited by public advertisement in one or more of the newspapers of said city of largest circulation for at least twenty days prior to the date specified in said advertisement for the opening of said proposals.

SEC. 3. That proposals made in response to said advertisement shall be addressed and mailed to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall then cause the said proposed sites, and such others as he may think proper to designate, to be examined in person by an agent of the Treasury Department, who shall make written report to said Secretary of the results of said examination and of his recommendation thereon and the reasons therefor, which shall be accompanied by the original proposals and all maps, plats, and statements which shall have come into his possession relating to said proposed sites.

SEC. 4. That if, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed sites and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary, and said commission shall, within thirty days after said examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all maps, statements, plats, or documents taken by or submitted to them, in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

SEC. 5. That the compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

SEC. 6. That the building shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF PHILIP M'LOSKEY AND JOHN HAGAN.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 2456.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2456) for the relief of the heirs and assignees of Philip McLoskey and John Hagan. It provides that the title of the heirs of Philip McLoskey and John Hagan, late of Mobile, Ala., deceased, or of such person or persons as by assignment, transfer, or conveyance from, through, or under Philip McLoskey and John Hagan may have claims thereto, to certain property in the city of Mobile, Ala., shall be confirmed, respectively, to the heirs of Philip McLoskey and John Hagan, or to their assignees or grantees to whom they may have conveyed the same or any part thereof during their lives, according to the rights which the said heirs, assignees, transferees, or grantees may have thereto from, through, or under Philip McLoskey and John Hagan; but this confirmation shall only extend to the relinquishment of any title which the United States may have to said land.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT REFORM SCHOOL.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 560, Senate bill 3490.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3490) in relation to admissions to and dismissions from the Reform School of the District of Columbia. It proposes to amend section 8 of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the various acts establishing and relating to the Reform School of the District of Columbia," approved May 3, 1876, by striking out the word "sixteen" and inserting the word "seventeen," so that the limit of the age of commitment shall be raised from 16 years to 17 years; and to amend section 15 so that it shall read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the board of trustees may make such by-laws, rules, and regulations for their own government and that of the institution, its officers, employees, and inmates, the employment, discipline, instruction, education, removal, and absolute, temporary, or conditional release of all boys committed to the school, as they may deem necessary and proper, and as are not contrary to the Constitution and to the laws of the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY H. BLOCKSON.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1364.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1364) increasing the pension of Henry H. Blockson, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry H. Blockson, late of Company F, One hundred and fifty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Henry H. Blockson."

HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEERS, CASTLE PINCKNEY, SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 888, Senate bill 1018.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1018) to establish a Branch Home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Castle Pinckney, in Charleston Harbor, South Carolina, or some other eligible site in or near that city, for the use of disabled officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army and Navy of the United States. It proposes that a Branch Home for the use of disabled officers and enlisted men of the Volunteer Army and Navy of the United States shall be established at Castle Pinckney, in Charleston Harbor, or some other eligible site in or near that city, and appropriates $100,000 for the construction of suitable buildings and the improvement of the surrounding grounds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TALLAHATCHIE RIVER BRIDGE, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 934, being Senate bill 3924.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3924) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Tallahatchie River, in Tallahatchie County, Miss.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 2, section 2, line 6, before the word "equal," to strike out "an;" and after the word "equal" to strike out "privilege of other post roads" and insert "privileges;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under this act and subject to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which no charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and munitions of war of the United States; and equal privileges in the use of said bridge shall be granted to all telegraph and telephone companies, and the United States shall have the right of way across said bridge and its approaches for postal telegraph purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 3, line 13, after the word "opening," to strike out "at" and insert "of;" in line 24, after the word "the," to strike out "full" and insert "free;" and on page 3, line 8, after the word "the," to strike out "full" and insert "free;" so as to read:

SEC. 3. That the said bridge shall be constructed as a wagon bridge, and shall contain a drawspan giving a clear opening of a width to be determined by the Secretary of War, which drawspan shall be maintained over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point; and said bridge other than the drawspan shall be at right angles to the current of the river at high water: Provided, That the said draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, for the passage of boats and rafts; and said board of supervisors shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset to sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe. No bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time unreasonably obstruct the free navigation of said river; and if any bridge erected under such authority shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, unreasonably obstruct navigation, he is hereby authorized to cause the entire removal thereof or such changes or alterations of said bridge to be made as will obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions shall be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the district court of the United States of the State of Mississippi, in whose jurisdiction any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located, etc.

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 4, line 4, after the word "be," to strike out "supplied" and insert "sufficiently;" and in line 12, after the word "construction," to insert "or after completion;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That any bridge authorized to be constructed under this act shall be built and located under and subject to such regulations for the security of navigation of the said river as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and to secure that object the said board of supervisors shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawing of the bridge, and a map of the location, giving, for the space of one-half mile above and one-half mile below the proposed location, the high and low water lines upon the banks of the river, the direction and strength of the currents at low and at high water, with the soundings accurately showing the bed of the stream, and the location of any other bridge or bridges, such maps to be sufficiently in detail, to enable the Secretary of War to judge of the proper location of said bridge, and shall furnish such other information as shall be required for a full and satisfactory understanding of the subject; and until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War the bridge shall not be commenced or built; and should any change be made in the plans of said bridge during the progress of its construction, or after completion, such changes shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 5, line 16, after the word "within" where it first occurs, to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" and in the same line, after the word "within" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to read:

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date thereof, etc.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BLUEFIELD, W. VA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration Senate bill 1664.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1664) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Bluefield, in the State of West Virginia.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "apparatus," to strike out "elevators and approaches;" and on page 2, line 1, after the word "of," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "seventy;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices, in the city of Bluefield and State of West Virginia, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 14, to strike out:

No money shall be used for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of West Virginia shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD M. TUCKER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4006.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4006) granting an increase of pension to Edward M. Tucker.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "Battery," to insert "late of;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward M. Tucker, late of Battery C, Massachusetts Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF NAVIGATION.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2380.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2380) to authorize the President of the United States to invite the International Congress of Navigation to hold its ninth session in Washington, D. C.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, section 2, line 8, after the word "the," to strike out "Librarian of Congress shall set apart and" and insert "Secretary of State shall;" in line 11, after the word "the" where it first occurs, to strike out "Library of Congress" and insert "city of Washington;" and in line 12, after the word "body," to strike out "Provided, That if the President of the United States shall deem it advisable, he may select and assign other suitable halls and rooms for the purposes in lieu thereof;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of State shall prepare for the use of said International Congress of Navigation suitable halls and rooms in the city of Washington for the meeting of said body.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 3, after the word "of," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be available as required and to be expended under the direction and at the discretion of the President of the United States, to meet the expenses incurred by the Government in connection with the ninth session of the International Congress of Navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GROSSE ISLE (MICHIGAN) LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3176) to provide for the erection of dwellings for the keepers of the Grosse Isle (Michigan) light-houses.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to go on with my remarks. The afternoon is passing away.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bill is only a few lines in length, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Michigan, and then I believe I ought to go on.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $8,500 for the construction of dwellings for the keepers of the light-houses on Grosse Isle, Michigan.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I ask to have read an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the naval appropriation bill concerning the Naval Observatory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CHANDLER to the naval appropriation bill.

That the permanent organization of the astronomical force at the Naval Observatory shall consist of an astronomical director with an annual salary of $5,000, a first astronomer with a salary of $4,000, a second astronomer with a salary of $3,600, a third astronomer with a salary of $3,200, a fourth astronomer with a salary of $2,800, a first assistant astronomer with a salary of $2,400, a second assistant astronomer with a salary of $2,200, a third assistant astronomer with a salary of $2,000, and such computers, clerks, and other employees as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law. The astronomical director and the four astronomers provided for by this act shall be appointed from time to time as they may be required to fill vacancies happening in the corps of professors of mathematics performing duty at the Observatory; and hereafter there shall be no new appointments of professors of mathematics in the Navy for duty at the Naval Observatory. The astronomical director, the astronomers, and the assistant astronomers shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

There shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a director of the Nautical Almanac, who shall receive an annual salary of $5,000: Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, defer making this appointment so long as a professor of mathematics is available for such position of director; and all the provisions hereinafter contained providing for a board of visitors shall apply to the Nautical Almanac Office. There shall be appointed by the President from persons not officers of the United States a board of nine visitors to the Naval Observatory, six to be astronomers of high professional standing and three to be eminent citizens of the United States. Appointments to this board shall be made for periods of three years, but provision shall be made by initial appointments for shorter terms, so that two astronomers and one member of the board not an astronomer shall retire in each year. Members of this board shall serve without compensation, but the Secretary of the Navy shall pay the actual expenses necessarily incurred by members of the board in the discharge of such duties as are assigned to them by the Secretary of the Navy or are otherwise imposed upon them. The board of visitors shall make an annual visitation to the Naval Observatory at a date to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy, and may make such other visitations, not exceeding two in number annually, by the full board or by a duly appointed committee, as may be deemed needful or expedient by a majority of the board.

The board of visitors shall report to the Secretary of the Navy at least once in each year the result of its examinations of the Naval Observatory as respects the condition of buildings, instruments, and apparatus, and the efficiency with which its scientific work is prosecuted. The board of visitors shall prepare and submit to the Secretary of the Navy regulations prescribing the scope of the astronomical and other researches of the Naval Observatory and the duties of its staff with reference thereto. When an appointment or detail is to be made to the office of astronomical director, director of the Nautical Almanac, astronomer, or assistant astronomer the board of visitors may recommend to the Secretary of the Navy a suitable person to fill such office, but such recommendation shall be determined only by a majority vote of the members present at a regularly called meeting of the board held in the city of Washington.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, through the courtesy of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Long, extended to me at the request of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr.

HALE, I acted, in the summer of 1899, as a visitor to the Naval Observatory in Washington, in company with Representative ALSTON G. DAYTON, member of the House from West Virginia, and three astronomical associates. They were Prof. Edward C. Pickering, Prof. George C. Comstock, and Prof. George E. Hale. Their eminent fitness for the service they were requested to undertake must be universally conceded. Professor Pickering, director of the astronomical observatory of Harvard College, did not obtain his earliest training as an astronomer, but as a student in physics. At the Lawrence Scientific School he studied, in turn, physiology, chemistry, mathematics, and civil engineering, and after graduating in the latter branch taught mathematics in connection with the work at that school, but shortly went to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and at 21 years of age was its assistant professor of physics, soon being placed in charge of the department of physics, and for 10 years continued the development of the physical laboratory system which there had its origin. As the policy of the Harvard College Observatory had always been to study the physical properties of the stars, rather than their positions only, Professor Pickering's training in physics was considered a reason for offering him a position which would more naturally have been given to a professional astronomer. For twenty years his labors at that observatory have been distinguished by industry and tact, and have resulted in successful achievement sufficient to gratify his most commendable ambition to serve usefully his own institution and the observatories of the world in one of the noblest fields of human endeavor.

Professor Comstock, director of the Washburn Observatory, at Madison, Wis., was graduated in 1877 at the University of Michigan. He became connected as an assistant with the United States lake surveys and the Government improvement of the Mississippi River, and served for a time in the Nautical Almanac Office at Washington as a computer, also at the observatory at the University of Michigan, and at that of the University of Wisconsin. Varying his studies, he was graduated from the law school of the latter university, but later became a professor of mathematics and astronomy in the Ohio State University, and, returning again to the Wisconsin University, became first a professor of astronomy, later associate director, and finally, in 1889, the director. He has published five volumes of the observatory transactions, and contributed numerous papers of value to astronomical journals, and is a member of the National Academy of Sciences of the Société Astronomique de France, the Astronomische Gesellschaft, and other scientific bodies. A laborious scholar, in the maturity of his powers, and with untiring energy, he has rendered, and will continue to render, invaluable service in the absorbing vocation he has chosen.

Professor Hale, director of the Yerkes Observatory, the youngest member of the board of visitors, was born in 1868; was devoted in childhood to mechanical work and scientific experiments; studied at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Harvard Observatory, and pursued his labors at a spectroscopic laboratory erected by his father, the late William E. Hale, of Chicago. In 1889 he invented the spectroheliograph, for photographing solar prominences and other solar phenomena, and in 1891 perfected the instrument which was used with a 12-inch telescope provided by his father for his special laboratory and observatory in Chicago, known as the Kenwood Observatory, and for the invention and use of the spectroheliograph he was awarded the Janssen medal by the Paris Academy of Sciences. Learning from Alvan Clark of an opportunity to purchase 40-inch glass disks for a large telescopic objective, he induced President Harper, of the University of Chicago, to invite the subject to the attention of Mr. Yerkes, who purchased the glass and presented to the university the Yerkes telescope and observatory, which were located at Williams Bay, Wis., where, in 1896, Mr. Hale went as the director.

Mr. Hale's career has already been eventful. In 1892 he became an associate professor of astrophysics and director of the observatory at the Chicago University, and an associate editor of Astronomy and Astrophysics. In 1893 he made an astrophysical expedition to Pikes Peak, and was secretary of the International Congress of Astronomy at the Columbian Exposition. In 1894 he studied at the University of Berlin; made an astrophysical expedition to Mount Ætna; secured the cooperation of European astrophysicists in establishing the Astrophysical Journal, an international review, and in 1897 organized the American Conference of Astronomers and Astrophysicists held at the dedication of the Yerkes Observatory, and repeated at Cambridge in 1898 and at Williams Bay in 1899, when the permanent society was established, of which he is a vice-president. He is also a Foreign Associate of the Royal Astronomical Society of London, and a member of other scientific societies. Mr. Hale's recognition as one of the first astronomers of the country is complete, and with his youth, his extensive knowledge and attainments, and his devotion to his work, he has before him, if his life is spared, a career of the highest possible usefulness in his fascinating profession.

The visitors met at Washington on the 30th of June, 1899, and examined the Observatory, and made another visit on September 26, and they submitted, on the 2d day of October, a unanimous report to the Secretary of the Navy. This report, on December 11, 1899, was printed by Congress as Senate Document No. 19 of the Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, and its recommendations were approved and favorably commended to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 7, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, a copy of the report of a board of visitors to the United States Naval Observatory for the year 1899. This report is referred to in the annual report of the Department to the President, and its conclusions and recommendations are, on account of their great importance, especially commended to consideration. It is believed that the enactment of the legislation recommended by the board of visitors will materially promote the usefulness of this national institution.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
United States Senate.

REASONS FOR THE VISITATION.

This visitation to the Naval Observatory grew out of a widespread feeling in the country among citizens interested in astronomy that something ought to be done to satisfy the great body of American astronomers and scientists that the future work of an observatory supported by the money of the whole people would be wisely, judiciously, and profitably conducted. This feeling in the country had been based upon three impressions: First, that the work at the Naval Observatory had not been carried forward on a systematic and comprehensive plan, extending over a sufficiently long period of time; second, that the results of the astronomical work of the Observatory had not been commensurate with the money cost to the Government; and third, that the naval influence and naval control are not beneficial and that a management wholly conducted by civilians would be better and more appropriate.

These feelings had found expression in various ways, notably at meetings of astronomers and astrophysicists, the first at the dedication of the Yerkes Observatory in October, 1897, 57 persons being present, and the second at the Harvard College Observatory in August, 1898, at which 92 persons were present, and by ballot Professors Pickering, Comstock, and Hale were appointed a committee to obtain the opinions of American astronomers and bring the subject to the attention of the Secretary of the Navy. In February, 1899, these gentlemen presented the result of their inquiries to the Secretary of the Navy as follows:

MEMORANDUM.

A circular was sent to the principal astronomers in the United States asking six questions regarding means of increasing its astronomical efficiency. Sixty-one replies were received, with the following approximate results, doubtful answers being counted as one-half:

1. A change in organization is recommended: 51 to 2.
2. The entire direction of the Observatory should be intrusted to an astronomer: 54 to 3.
3. Transfer of the Observatory to some other Department of the Government: 19 to 19.
4. Separation from the Observatory of various branches, such as the testing of nautical instruments: 26 to 24.
5. Tenure of office and advancement should depend on scientific efficiency rather than upon age or length of service: 50 to 2.
6. A visiting committee should be appointed: 43 to 6.

It therefore appears that opinion is nearly equally divided whether a portion or the whole of the Observatory should be transferred to some other Department, but is nearly unanimously in favor of changing the present organization, of intrusting the entire direction to an astronomer, of making advancement depend on scientific efficiency, and of appointing a visiting committee. To be efficient this committee should have power to act and should consist of experts who would serve without pay.

After considering this report the Secretary of the Navy wisely concluded to meet the issue, if there was an issue, by inviting these very gentlemen to make an examination of the Naval Observatory and to come into close contact with the subject-matter with which they had undertaken to deal, and the Secretary, whether wisely or unwisely, invited Representative DAYTON and myself to assist these distinguished astronomers in their inquiry.

CONCLUSIONS OF THE VISITORS.

The visitation was useful, I think, in reference to various minor matters of which I will not now speak, and the conclusions on the principal questions considered were as follows:

First. That it would not be feasible at this time to separate the Observatory wholly from the Navy Department. The position of the visitors was carefully stated in a resolution adopted by them on June 30, 1899, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the absence of a national university, a department of science and industries, or other department or bureau especially suited to the conduct of scientific work, and in view of the diversity of opinion among astronomers regarding the proposed removal of the Naval Observatory from the Navy Department, the board believes it to be inexpedient at the present time to make any recommendations upon that subject.

The foregoing conclusion was justified by the votes of the various astronomers who had been previously consulted by the committee. They had been substantially unanimous on the following points: (1) That there should be a change in the organization of the Observatory; (2) that its entire direction should be intrusted

The next amendment was, on page 4, section 5, line 16, after the word "within" where it first occurs, to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" and in the same line, after the word "within" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to read:

SEC. 5. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date thereof, etc.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BLUEFIELD, W. VA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration Senate bill 1664.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1664) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Bluefield, in the State of West Virginia.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, line 7, after the word "apparatus," to strike out "elevators and approaches;" and on page 2, line 1, after the word "of," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "seventy;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site, and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other Government offices, in the city of Bluefield and State of West Virginia, the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches, complete, not to exceed the sum of $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 14, to strike out:

No money shall be used for the purpose mentioned until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of West Virginia shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDWARD M. TUCKER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4006.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4006) granting an increase of pension to Edward M. Tucker.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, before the word "Battery," to insert "late of;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward M. Tucker, late of Battery C, Massachusetts Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF NAVIGATION.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2330.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2330) to authorize the President of the United States to invite the International Congress of Navigation to hold its ninth session in Washington, D. C.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments. The first amendment was, on page 1, section 2, line 8, after the word "the," to strike out "Librarian of Congress shall set apart and" and insert "Secretary of State shall;" in line 11, after the word "the" where it first occurs, to strike out "Library of Congress" and insert "city of Washington;" and in line 12, after the word "body," to strike out "Provided, That if the President of the United States shall deem it advisable, he may select and assign other suitable halls and rooms for the purposes in lieu thereof;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of State shall prepare for the use of said International Congress of Navigation suitable halls and rooms in the city of Washington for the meeting of said body.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, section 3, after the word "of," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be available as required and to be expended under the direction and at the discretion of the President of the United States, to meet the expenses incurred by the Government in connection with the ninth session of the International Congress of Navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GROSSE ISLE (MICHIGAN) LIGHT-HOUSES.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3176) to provide for the erection of dwellings for the keepers of the Grosse Isle (Michigan) light-houses.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to go on with my remarks. The afternoon is passing away.

Mr. McMILLAN. The bill is only a few lines in length, I will say to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Michigan, and then I believe I ought to go on.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $8,500 for the construction of dwellings for the keepers of the light-houses on Grosse Isle, Michigan.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I ask to have read an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the naval appropriation bill concerning the Naval Observatory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CHANDLER to the naval appropriation bill.

That the permanent organization of the astronomical force at the Naval Observatory shall consist of an astronomical director with an annual salary of $6,000, a first astronomer with a salary of $4,000, a second astronomer with a salary of $3,600, a third astronomer with a salary of $3,200, a fourth astronomer with a salary of $2,800, a first assistant astronomer with a salary of $2,400, a second assistant astronomer with a salary of $2,200, a third assistant astronomer with a salary of $2,000, and such computers, clerks, and other employees as are now or may hereafter be authorized by law. The astronomical director and the four astronomers provided for by this act shall be appointed from time to time as they may be required to fill vacancies happening in the corps of professors of mathematics performing duty at the Observatory; and hereafter there shall be no new appointments of professors of mathematics in the Navy for duty at the Naval Observatory. The astronomical director, the astronomers, and the assistant astronomers shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

There shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a director of the Nautical Almanac, who shall receive an annual salary of $5,000: Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, defer making this appointment so long as a professor of mathematics is available for such position of director; and all the provisions hereinafter contained providing for a board of visitors shall apply to the Nautical Almanac Office. There shall be appointed by the President from persons not officers of the United States a board of nine visitors to the Naval Observatory, six to be astronomers of high professional standing and three to be eminent citizens of the United States. Appointments to this board shall be made for periods of three years, but provision shall be made by initial appointments for shorter terms, so that two astronomers and one member of the board not an astronomer shall retire in each year. Members of this board shall serve without compensation, but the Secretary of the Navy shall pay the actual expenses necessarily incurred by members of the board in the discharge of such duties as are assigned to them by the Secretary of the Navy or are otherwise imposed upon them. The board of visitors shall make an annual visitation to the Naval Observatory at a date to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy, and may make such other visitations, not exceeding two in number annually, by the full board or by a duly appointed committee, as may be deemed needful or expedient by a majority of the board.

The board of visitors shall report to the Secretary of the Navy at least once in each year the result of its examinations of the Naval Observatory as respects the condition of buildings, instruments, and apparatus, and the efficiency with which its scientific work is prosecuted. The board of visitors shall prepare and submit to the Secretary of the Navy regulations prescribing the scope of the astronomical and other researches of the Naval Observatory and the duties of its staff with reference thereto. When an appointment or detail is to be made to the office of astronomical director, director of the Nautical Almanac, astronomer, or assistant astronomer the board of visitors may recommend to the Secretary of the Navy a suitable person to fill such office, but such recommendation shall be determined only by a majority vote of the members present at a regularly called meeting of the board held in the city of Washington.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, through the courtesy of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Long, extended to me at the request of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr.

HALE, I acted, in the summer of 1899, as a visitor to the Naval Observatory in Washington, in company with Representative ALSTON G. DAYTON, member of the House from West Virginia, and three astronomical associates. They were Prof. Edward C. Pickering, Prof. George C. Comstock, and Prof. George E. Hale. Their eminent fitness for the service they were requested to undertake must be universally conceded. Professor Pickering, director of the astronomical observatory of Harvard College, did not obtain his earliest training as an astronomer, but as a student in physics. At the Lawrence Scientific School he studied, in turn, physiology, chemistry, mathematics, and civil engineering, and after graduating in the latter branch taught mathematics in connection with the work at that school, but shortly went to the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and at 21 years of age was its assistant professor of physics, soon being placed in charge of the department of physics, and for 10 years continued the development of the physical laboratory system which there had its origin. As the policy of the Harvard College Observatory had always been to study the physical properties of the stars, rather than their positions only, Professor Pickering's training in physics was considered a reason for offering him a position which would more naturally have been given to a professional astronomer. For twenty years his labors at that observatory have been distinguished by industry and tact, and have resulted in successful achievement sufficient to gratify his most commendable ambition to serve usefully his own institution and the observatories of the world in one of the noblest fields of human endeavor.

Professor Comstock, director of the Washburn Observatory, at Madison, Wis., was graduated in 1877 at the University of Michigan. He became connected as an assistant with the United States lake surveys and the Government improvement of the Mississippi River, and served for a time in the Nautical Almanac Office at Washington as a computer, also at the observatory at the University of Michigan, and at that of the University of Wisconsin. Varying his studies, he was graduated from the law school of the latter university, but later became a professor of mathematics and astronomy in the Ohio State University, and, returning again to the Wisconsin University, became first a professor of astronomy, later associate director, and finally, in 1889, the director. He has published five volumes of the observatory transactions, and contributed numerous papers of value to astronomical journals, and is a member of the National Academy of Sciences of the Société Astronomique de France, the Astronomische Gesellschaft, and other scientific bodies. A laborious scholar, in the maturity of his powers, and with untiring energy, he has rendered, and will continue to render, invaluable service in the absorbing vocation he has chosen.

Professor Hale, director of the Yerkes Observatory, the youngest member of the board of visitors, was born in 1868; was devoted in childhood to mechanical work and scientific experiments; studied at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the Harvard Observatory, and pursued his labors at a spectroscopic laboratory erected by his father, the late William E. Hale, of Chicago. In 1889 he invented the spectroheliograph, for photographing solar prominences and other solar phenomena, and in 1891 perfected the instrument which was used with a 12-inch telescope provided by his father for his special laboratory and observatory in Chicago, known as the Kenwood Observatory, and for the invention and use of the spectroheliograph he was awarded the Janssen medal by the Paris Academy of Sciences. Learning from Alvan Clark of an opportunity to purchase 40-inch glass disks for a large telescopic objective, he induced President Harper, of the University of Chicago, to invite the subject to the attention of Mr. Yerkes, who purchased the glass and presented to the university the Yerkes telescope and observatory, which were located at Williams Bay, Wis., where, in 1896, Mr. Hale went as the director.

Mr. Hale's career has already been eventful. In 1892 he became an associate professor of astrophysics and director of the observatory at the Chicago University, and an associate editor of Astronomy and Astrophysics. In 1893 he made an astrophysical expedition to Pikes Peak, and was secretary of the International Congress of Astronomy at the Columbian Exposition. In 1894 he studied at the University of Berlin; made an astrophysical expedition to Mount Ætna; secured the cooperation of European astrophysicists in establishing the Astrophysical Journal, an international review, and in 1897 organized the American Conference of Astronomers and Astrophysicists held at the dedication of the Yerkes Observatory, and repeated at Cambridge in 1898 and at Williams Bay in 1899, when the permanent society was established, of which he is a vice-president. He is also a Foreign Associate of the Royal Astronomical Society of London, and a member of other scientific societies. Mr. Hale's recognition as one of the first astronomers of the country is complete, and with his youth, his extensive knowledge and attainments, and his devotion to his work, he has before him, if his life is spared, a career of the highest possible usefulness in his fascinating profession.

The visitors met at Washington on the 30th of June, 1899, and examined the Observatory, and made another visit on September 26, and they submitted, on the 2d day of October, a unanimous report to the Secretary of the Navy. This report, on December 11, 1899, was printed by Congress as Senate Document No. 19 of the Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, and its recommendations were approved and favorably commended to Congress by the Secretary of the Navy, as follows;

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, December 7, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the Senate, a copy of the report of a board of visitors to the United States Naval Observatory for the year 1899. This report is referred to in the annual report of the Department to the President, and its conclusions and recommendations are, on account of their great importance, especially commended to consideration. It is believed that the enactment of the legislation recommended by the board of visitors will materially promote the usefulness of this national institution.

Very respectfully, JOHN D. LONG,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
United States Senate.

REASONS FOR THE VISITATION.

This visitation to the Naval Observatory grew out of a widespread feeling in the country among citizens interested in astronomy that something ought to be done to satisfy the great body of American astronomers and scientists that the future work of an observatory supported by the money of the whole people would be wisely, judiciously, and profitably conducted. This feeling in the country had been based upon three impressions: First, that the work at the Naval Observatory had not been carried forward on a systematic and comprehensive plan, extending over a sufficiently long period of time; second, that the results of the astronomical work of the Observatory had not been commensurate with the money cost to the Government; and third, that the naval influence and naval control are not beneficial and that a management wholly conducted by civilians would be better and more appropriate.

These feelings had found expression in various ways, notably at meetings of astronomers and astrophysicists, the first at the dedication of the Yerkes Observatory in October, 1897, 57 persons being present, and the second at the Harvard College Observatory in August, 1898, at which 92 persons were present, and by ballot Professors Pickering, Comstock, and Hale were appointed a committee to obtain the opinions of American astronomers and bring the subject to the attention of the Secretary of the Navy. In February, 1899, these gentlemen presented the result of their inquiries to the Secretary of the Navy as follows:

MEMORANDUM.

A circular was sent to the principal astronomers in the United States asking six questions regarding means of increasing its astronomical efficiency. Sixty-one replies were received, with the following approximate results, doubtful answers being counted as one-half:

1. A change in organization is recommended: 51 to 2.
2. The entire direction of the Observatory should be intrusted to an astronomer: 54 to 3.
3. Transfer of the Observatory to some other Department of the Government: 19 to 19.
4. Separation from the Observatory of various branches, such as the testing of nautical instruments: 26 to 24.
5. Tenure of office and advancement should depend on scientific efficiency rather than upon age or length of service: 50 to 2.
6. A visiting committee should be appointed: 43 to 6.

It therefore appears that opinion is nearly equally divided whether a portion or the whole of the Observatory should be transferred to some other Department, but is nearly unanimously in favor of changing the present organization, of intrusting the entire direction to an astronomer, of making advancement depend on scientific efficiency, and of appointing a visiting committee. To be efficient this committee should have power to act and should consist of experts who would serve without pay.

After considering this report the Secretary of the Navy wisely concluded to meet the issue, if there was an issue, by inviting these very gentlemen to make an examination of the Naval Observatory and to come into close contact with the subject-matter with which they had undertaken to deal, and the Secretary, whether wisely or unwisely, invited Representative DAYTON and myself to assist these distinguished astronomers in their inquiry.

CONCLUSIONS OF THE VISITORS.

The visitation was useful, I think, in reference to various minor matters of which I will not now speak, and the conclusions on the principal questions considered were as follows:

First. That it would not be feasible at this time to separate the Observatory wholly from the Navy Department. The position of the visitors was carefully stated in a resolution adopted by them on June 30, 1899, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the absence of a national university, a department of science and industries, or other department or bureau especially suited to the conduct of scientific work, and in view of the diversity of opinion among astronomers regarding the proposed removal of the Naval Observatory from the Navy Department, the board believes it to be inexpedient at the present time to make any recommendations upon that subject.

The foregoing conclusion was justified by the votes of the various astronomers who had been previously consulted by the committee. They had been substantially unanimous on the following points: (1) That there should be a change in the organization of the Observatory; (2) that its entire direction should be intrusted to an astronomer; (3) that there should be a civilian corps of astronomers instead of military officers in charge, and (4) that there should be a board of visitors.

But on the question of complete separation of the Observatory from the Navy Department they had divided as follows: Twenty-six had voted in favor of separating the Observatory from the Navy Department and 24 had voted against the separation.

Of course the astronomers on the board of visitors might have espoused the proposition of the 26 astronomers who had given their opinions in favor of taking the Observatory away from the Navy Department and might have contended for such separation. If they had done so, however, the Congressional members would doubtless have dissented, not on theoretical grounds, but for the practical reasons stated in the vote adopted, that there is not now any other appropriate control to which Congress could transfer the Observatory if it were to be taken from the Navy Department; and with this difference in the board upon the fundamental question the visitation would have terminated.

The astronomical members therefore wisely, I think, consented to postpone the question of separation and proceeded to consider the practical question, what improvement could be made in the management of the Observatory while under naval supervision.

THAT THE ASTRONOMICAL STAFF SHOULD BE CIVILIAN APPOINTEES.

The second conclusion of the visitors was that it was inexpedient that the astronomers in charge of the actual astronomical work at the Naval Observatory should be life officers in the Navy.

This was not a new idea of the board of visitors. They only adopted literally the recommendations of Secretary Long in his report for 1897, which I reproduce, as follows:

PROFESSORS OF MATHEMATICS.

The Department recommends that the statute authorizing the appointment of professors of mathematics be so amended that, without disturbing those who now hold the office, which would be unjust to them, no further appointments shall be made. The reason for the creation of the office has passed away. These professors were, at first, teachers of midshipmen on board ship, and were thus exposed to the dangers of service in war and at sea. They were therefore properly pensioned by a place upon the retired list. To-day their name is largely a misnomer. Under the law, one is assignable to the teaching of ethics and English studies, one of Spanish, and one of drawing. In fact, only one teaches mathematics at the Naval Academy. Several of them are on duty at the Naval Observatory, two are librarians, one is engaged in ordnance work, and another in the Bureau of Yards and Docks. They have no service at sea, and there is no more reason why hereafter the retired list should be open to a new appointee to the work now done by this corps than to any other employee in civil life.

If this recommendation is adopted by Congress it will be necessary to provide for the appointment of astronomers at the Naval Observatory to take the places as they shall become vacant of existing professors of mathematics who now serve in that capacity. There should be five astronomers, as at present, and the salary of those hereafter appointed should be sufficient to make up for the refusal to them of the privilege of retirement, and also to secure men of high scientific attainments adequate to the demands of one of the most capable observatories of the world. As the above astronomical corps is now full, no appointment under the new statute proposed will be necessary until a vacancy occurs.

The foregoing recommendation of Secretary Long proposes to eventually abolish, by omitting to make new appointments, the professors of mathematics at the Naval Academy (three of whom, grotesquely enough, are by law only allowed to teach—the one ethics and English studies, another the Spanish language, and a third the art of drawing), and also the professors of mathematics engaged in astronomical work at the Observatory, making twelve in all to be finally dispensed with.

The board of visitors reenforce the argument of Secretary Long against life astronomers as follows:

In addition to the reasons for this action which are urged by you in that report, we submit for your consideration that the conditions under which astronomical work is done are so different from those which obtain in the naval service that a fixed tenure of office, with the certainty of a retiring pension in no way dependent upon the zeal or efficiency with which service has been rendered, may easily produce diminished diligence and a purely perfunctory discharge of duties. A more serious evil of the existing system of naval commissions for astronomers, which has been forcibly exemplified within the past decade, is the compulsory retirement at the age of 62 of astronomers, who are then in the maturity of their powers, and who under civilian appointments would continue to render to the Observatory a service of undiminished efficiency which they now transfer to other institutions. The reasons which impel the retirement of a naval officer from active service upon attaining a fixed age have no application in the case of an astronomer, and he should be placed upon the same footing with other officers of the Government performing strictly civilian duties.

The opinion expressed by Secretary Long that the corps of mathematical professors who "never go to sea" should be abolished has been, at all times, my own view. The law of August 3, 1848, creating the corps of not exceeding twelve professors of mathematics provided that they should not only serve at the Naval Academy and at the Observatory, but also perform their duties in instructing the midshipmen of the Navy "on board ships of war." The corps has, however, in process of time grown to be only a land force, and a professor of mathematics at sea in these times would be an anomaly and hindrance.

THERE SHOULD BE NO NAVAL OFFICERS WHO NEVER GO TO SEA.

I would carry the change much further than Secretary Long proposes, and would have no life officers, of any kind whatever, in the Navy enjoying the rank and pay appertaining to the Navy and Army, and the privilege of retirement for life on three-fourths the highest pay, who do not go to sea.

This rule I would make an inexorable law of Congress. The high privilege of belonging to the only life aristocracy which participates in the government of this Republic should be given only to those who make it their life business, for the Republic's sake, to expose their lives to the perils of the ocean and the perils of war. Army and Navy officers, Army and Navy soldiers and seamen we cheerfully support with active and retired pay so long as they live, because we can not otherwise keep in existence in peace as well as in war the military forces necessary to preserve and perpetuate the life of the nation against all its enemies and opposers whomsoever. But outside these military aristocracies, which we willingly maintain and love and cherish, there should be no life officers connected with our Government and no retired pay or pensions to civilian employees. On the contrary, rotation in all other officers of state not mere clerks should be the rule in accordance with the wise principle upon which our fathers founded this Republic and which is found so aptly expressed in the constitutions of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Vermont, and Virginia, as follows:

Constitution of Massachusetts, 1780 (Poore's Charters and Constitutions, page 958, Article VIII):

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments.

Constitution of Pennsylvania, 1776 (Poore, page 1541, Article VI):

That those who are employed in the legislative and executive business of the State may be restrained from oppression, the people have a right, at such periods as they may think proper, to reduce their public officers to a private station, and supply the vacancies by certain and regular elections.

Constitution of Vermont, 1777 (Poore, page 1859, chapter 1, Article VII):

That those who are employed in the legislative and executive business of the State may be restrained from oppression, the people have a right, at such periods as they may think proper, to reduce their public officers to a private station, and supply the vacancies by certain and regular elections.

Virginia bill of rights, 1776 (Poore, page 1909, section 5):

That the legislative and executive powers of the State should be separate and distinct from the judiciary, and that the members of the two first may be restrained from oppression, by feeling and participating in the burdens of the people, they should at fixed periods be reduced to a private station, return into that body from which they were originally taken, and the vacancies be supplied by frequent, certain, and regular elections, in which all or any part of the former members to be again eligible or ineligible, as the law shall direct.

While I do not say that there should be constant rotation among astronomers and other scientists in the service of the Government, I do maintain that we should not make captains and admirals in the Navy of the astronomers, architects, and land surveyors whom the Secretary even of the Ocean Department may need to employ in useful service for the Government.

THERE SHOULD BE AN EFFICIENT BOARD OF VISITORS.

The third conclusion was that there ought to be a permanent and continuous board of visitors to the Observatory with more powers than those usually given to boards of visitors of a similar character.

The powers proposed have been well defined by various naval Superintendents of the Observatory, and notably by Capt. F. E. Chadwick when Chief of the Bureau of Equipment, in charge of the Observatory, and Capt. Charles H. Davis, the present Superintendent of the Observatory. These two officers, on September 7, 1897 (see report of board of visitors, Appendix, Exhibit B), said, as to the duties of a suitable board of visitors:

It lays down the general course of policy to be pursued for the coming year, including printing and publication of observations; fixes the estimates for the astronomical departments; nominates to fill vacancies in the astronomical staff (either by appointment or promotion); and recommends as to repairs and acquisitions of new instruments.

I may add to these views, which are accepted by the Secretary of the Navy and the board of visitors, that it is deemed essential to the success of the proposed plan for visitation that the board should possess more powers than those exercised by the boards now visiting the West Point and Annapolis academies, who merely observe and give advice.

The board of visitors to the Naval Observatory, if Congress approves our plan, are to become a part of the governing body and are to fix and establish the rules of procedure which, after approval by the Secretary of the Navy, are to govern the conduct of the Observatory staff. Their recommendations as to the selections of the personnel are necessarily only advisory. But it is expected that they shall have, sub modo, such participation in executive functions that it will be necessary to exclude Senators and members of Congress from the board.

Such a board of visitors, consisting of six astronomers of high professional standing and three eminent citizens, acting with the powers and under the limitations of the proposed law, can not fail to realize the expectations of its advocates.

To avoid any suggestion that they wish further personal recognition, the astronomical members have written to me as follows:

If at any time in the progress of the bill it should appear that serious objection to it is made on the ground that the astronomers who were members of the late board of visitors are seeking to obtain for themselves control of the Observatory, we authorize you to state at such time and in such form as you may think best that we are not candidates for appointment to any future board and shall not feel aggrieved or slighted if no one of us is included in its composition.

Very respectfully,

EDWARD C. PICKERING.
GEO. C. COMSTOCK.
GEORGE E. HALE.

JANUARY 30, 1900.

THE NECESSITY OF SOME IMPROVEMENT.

The foregoing two recommendations of the board of visitors—(1) that there shall exist under the naval head of the Observatory a corps of civilian astronomers, and (2) that there shall be a permanent board of visitors, with ample powers, on which shall be represented the astronomers of the country—make an issue which is now presented to Congress, and the plan thus proposed is the only method in sight by which public controversy can be arrested and the management of the Observatory under naval control can be helped to secure the approval and cooperation of the scientists of the country. My whole thought on this subject can be best expressed by repeating the closing words of the recommendations of the board of visitors:

In concluding its recommendations the board of visitors wishes earnestly to urge upon your consideration the necessity of making a success of the movement which you have begun in order to improve the condition of the Naval Observatory and to make its administration satisfactory to the great body of the astronomers of the country and to the public.

Some of our recommendations, if they meet your approval, can be carried into effect by departmental action, but the changes which we regard as vital can only be obtained through legislation by Congress. If such legislation is withheld, the continuance of present conditions is sure to result in a renewed, persistent, and possibly acrimonious demand for the removal of the Observatory from naval control. If, however, the legislation is enacted, and the improved system is given a fair trial, unquestionably much improvement will result, and it is not improbable that the Observatory will attain and hold that high standing in the scientific world which should be required of such an institution.

To help bring about such a desirable consummation we have complied with your request, although not made in pursuance of any law that we should visit and investigate the Observatory, and we have recommended specific measures which we hope will lead to those reforms in administration which are imperatively necessary if the Observatory is to receive and retain the confidence and support of the astronomers and scientists of the world.

THE REQUEST OF THE ASTRONOMERS OF THE NATION.

Since the report of the board of visitors and the subsequent approval by Secretary Long of their recommendations the subject has not been allowed to slumber by the astronomers and scientists of the country. On January 17, 1900, the council of the Astronomical and Astrophysical Society of America, at a meeting in the city of New York, unanimously adopted resolutions as follows:

Whereas the report of the board of visitors to the United States Naval Observatory has been brought to the attention of the council of the Astronomical and Astrophysical Society of America:

Resolved, 1. That the council learns with pleasure of the action of the Secretary of the Navy in instituting measures for increasing the efficiency of the Naval Observatory. 2. That in accordance with the provisions of article 3, section 1, of the constitution of the Astronomical and Astrophysical Society of America, the council, acting on behalf of the said society, heartily indorses the measures recommended by the board of visitors and transmitted by the Secretary of the Navy, with his approval, to the Senate of the United States under date of December 7, 1899. 3. The recommendations of the board of visitors, which in the judgment of the council are of fundamental importance and most urgently required by the present condition of the Observatory, are the following: (a) The establishment of a continuous board of visitors, composed in major part of persons having technical knowledge of the conduct of an observatory. (b) The establishment by law of directorships of the Observatory and of the Nautical Almanac, to be filled by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. (c) The amendment of the statute authorizing the appointment of professors of mathematics in the Navy, so that, without disturbing those who now hold office, no further appointments of professors of mathematics shall be made for the staff of the Naval Observatory. 4. That copies of these resolutions be transmitted to the Secretary of the Navy and to the chairmen of the Naval Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Necessarily restricted, as Representative DAYTON and I were and were doubtless intended to be, to the practical side of the questions considered by the visitors, we soon came to realize the magnificent provision which has been made by the great governments of the world and by generous-minded and opulent donors for supplying the telescopes and other instruments, and the observatories containing them, by means of which new discoveries in astronomical research are being constantly made to promote the material interests and to delight the imagination and stimulate the mental activities of mankind.

THE OBSERVATORIES OF EUROPE.

The great observatories of (1) Greenwich, in England, (2) Paris, (3) Berlin, (4) Potadam, in Germany, (5) Pulkowa, in Russia, and (6) Leyden, in Holland, "their organization and methods of work," are described by Prof. Stimson J. Brown, in his report of February 19, 1896, to the Secretary of the Navy, printed as a part of the Report of the Board of Visitors, page 61, being Exhibit R.

THE OBSERVATORIES OF THE UNITED STATES.

In this country there are six observatories possessing large refractors and otherwise well equipped for the highest astronomical research, conducted by observers capable and efficient, and supported by income sufficient to properly utilize the instruments and facilities provided, and at these observatories continuous, well-planned, and efficient work is being done.

There are as many more observatories nearly as well equipped as these six, but from a lack of income, or other good reasons, their instruments and facilities are not properly utilized.

Then follow the many telescopes at colleges, schools, and in private hands, which, if faithfully used, are valuable aids to the more pretentious institutions.

Astronomy is taught at almost all American colleges, nearly all possessing telescopes larger than are needed for purposes of instruction, which requires only instruments having apertures from 4 to 6 inches. The price of a good 12-inch lens is $3,000, and for the mounting at least as much more, and for the building an indefinite sum. The price increases rapidly with the enlargement of the aperture, a 15-inch lens costing twice as much as a 12-inch lens.

I have endeavored to obtain some information about the observatories of all grades and the telescopes above 4 inches in diameter, and submit a list numbering 65, as follows:

In addition to the foregoing list, there appear in a "partial list of telescopes in the United States," prepared by William H. Knight and published in The Sidereal Messenger, October, 1891, the names of certain observatories at which there are telescopes of upward of 4 inches aperture. The correctness of this list I have not been able to verify, but there are undoubtedly in this country many additional telescopes of small size, which, upon a suitably arranged plan, could be continuously used and made helpful to the general astronomical work of the large observatories. But to ostentatiously give a handsome telescope to a school or a village without making provision for continuous observations by skilled eyes and hands is no real benefit to science.

Mr. Knight's list is as follows:

Buchtel College Observatory	Akron, Ohio.
Alfred Observatory	Alfred Center, N. Y.
Melville Smith Observatory	Augusta, Me.
George Gildersleeve Observatory	Baltimore, Md.
Normal School Observatory
John R. Hooper Observatory

Yerkes Observatory of the University of Chicago, located at Williams Bay, Wis., George E. Hale, director.—The Yerkes Observatory has the form of a Latin cross, the longer axis of which lies due east and west. The 90-foot dome, which contains the 40-inch telescope, is at the western extremity of the building. At the eastern extremity is the meridian room, and the 26-foot and 30-foot domes terminate the north and south transepts. The motions of the great dome, the rising floor which gives access to the telescope in all its positions, and the telescope itself, are obtained by electric motors.

The large telescope is provided with all necessary accessories, including position micrometer, solar spectroscope, stellar spectrograph, spectroheliograph, and photoheliograph. In the 26-foot dome is mounted the 12-inch refractor, formerly at the Kenwood Observatory at Chicago, the entire instrumental equipment of this institution having been donated to the Yerkes Observatory. In the 30-foot dome a 24-inch reflecting telescope is mounted. The mirror of this instrument was made by Mr. W. G. Ritchey, optician of the Yerkes Observatory. Between the small domes is the heliostat room. Within the heliostat room are the mirrors and radiometer used by Professor Nichols for his measures of stellar heat radiations. In the meridian room a 3½-inch transit instrument is used for latitude and time observations. The body of the building, between the domes, is divided into laboratories for physical and chemical work and offices for members of the staff.

The principal work of the observatory, under the director, George E. Hale, includes: 1. Observations of double stars with the 40-inch telescope, by Professor Burnham. 2. Micrometric observations of star clusters, nebulæ, planets, satellites, comets, etc., with the 40-inch telescope, by Professor Barnard. 3. Photographic studies of stellar spectra with the 40-inch telescope, by Professor Hale and Mr. Ellerman. 4. Determination of the motion of stars toward or from the earth and of the motion of the solar system in space with the 40-inch telescope, by Professor Frost, Mr. Ellerman, and Mr. Adams. 5. Spectroscopic observations of the sun and photographic work with the spectroheliograph attached to the 40-inch telescope, by Professor Hale. 6. Stellar and nebular photography with a 6-inch portrait lens, by Professor Barnard, and with the 24-inch reflecting telescope, by Mr. Ritchey. 7. Miscellaneous spectroscopic and bolometric work. 8. Transit observations for the time service, by Mr. Adams.

Lick Observatory of the University of California, located at Mount Hamilton, California, J. E. Keeler, director.—The observatory consists of a main building containing computing rooms, library, and the domes of the 36-inch equatorial and the 12-inch equatorial, and detached buildings to shelter the Crossley reflector, the meridian circle, the transit, the horizontal photoheliograph, the portable equatorial, and the Crocker and Floyd photographic telescopes. On the ground are dwelling houses for the astronomers, students, and employees and shops for the workmen.

The observatory is fully provided with instruments, some of which are the 36-inch equatorial objective, by Alvan Clark & Son, mounting by Warner & Swasey; this instrument has also a photographic corrector of 33 inches, figured by Alvan G. Clark; 3-foot reflecting telescope; 12-inch equatorial; 6-inch Bruce comet-seeker; 6½-inch equatorial mounting; 5-inch Floyd telescope; 6½-inch meridian circle; 4-inch transit; 4-inch comet seeker; 5-inch horizontal photoheliograph; Crocker photographic telescope; a spectroscope, specially adapted for photography, given by Hon. D. O. Mills for use with the 36-inch refractor; a spectroscope specially adapted for photography with the Crossley reflector, and two photometers for use with the 36-inch and 12-inch telescopes have been provided from the proceeds of a gift from Miss C. W. Bruce, of New York City. There are, besides, many minor pieces of apparatus.

The scientific work of the observatory is under the director, James E. Keeler. The students' observatory at Berkeley, Cal., described elsewhere, belongs to the University of California.

The general policy is to carry on investigations which can not be pursued to so great advantage elsewhere. The observatory makes the most of its natural advantages, and extended theoretical researches, which can be made as well in a city as at a fine observing station, do not form a part of the general plan. The variety of instruments makes the field covered quite a wide one.

The principal work is devoted to spectroscopic determinations of the motions of stars in the line of sight, by Professor Campbell, assisted by Mr. Wright; and micrometric work and observations of the satellites of Neptune, Mars, and Uranus; measures of planetary nebulæ, for parallax; measures for determining a possible refractive effect on stars by the head of Swift's comet, by Professor Hussey and Messrs. Perrine and Aitken; observations of comets, and, in the case of expected comets, for purposes of discovery; measurement and discovery of double stars, by Messrs. Hussey and Aitken; astrophysical researches and photography of nebulæ, by Professor Keeler and Assistant Palmer; study of triple hydrogen lines, by Professor Campbell; investigation of stars in the great cluster in Hercules, by Mr. Palmer; telescopic photographs of the great nebula in Orion—an extension of the spectroscopic method to parts of the nebula which are too faint for visual observation; and a large variety of miscellaneous observations and computations.

United States Naval Observatory, located on Georgetown Heights, District of Columbia, Capt. C. H. Davis, U. S. N., director.—The instruments and accessories of the Naval Observatory consist of the great equatorial and accessories (including elevating floor); east meridian circle (Pistor & Martens, 9-inch, remodeled); south transit instrument; prime-vertical instrument; 12-inch equatorial; 6-inch transit circle (Warner & Swasey); 5-inch alt-azimuth and building (Warner & Swasey); 1 comet seeker, 4-inch (Brashear), alt-azimuth; 1 comet seeker, 4-inch (old equatorial mounting); 13 astronomical clocks; 7 chronographs (with stands and scales); 3 personal-equation apparatuses; 2 level triers; meteorological apparatus; transit of Venus measuring engine; equipment of magnetic observatory; 1 kathetometer; instruments for testing sextants. Instruments unmounted: 9.6-inch equatorial, 7½ equatorial, and Repsold transit circle (Naval Academy), transit of Venus outfits, etc.

The instrumental equipment is for the most part new, few of the instruments of the old observatory having been retained in their original form. An entirely new mounting has been provided for the 26-inch equatorial telescope, and the 9.6-inch telescope has been replaced by a new refractor of 12 inches aperture. A large spectrograph, of modern design, has been furnished for the 26-inch telescope. Two new instruments, constructed entirely of steel, have been added to the equipment. One of these is a meridian circle of 6 inches aperture, and the other is a 5-inch alt-azimuth. The 8.5-inch Pistor & Martens meridian circle has been furnished with a new objective of 9.1 inches aperture and the mounting reconstructed. All the new instruments are of American make.

The Observatory work is divided into two classes, astronomical and nautical. The first includes the department of astronomical observations and the department of the Nautical Almanac. The second includes the department of nautical instruments, the department of chronometers and time service, and the department of magnetism and meteorology. A naval assistant is provided for the superintendent, and provision is made for a director of the Nautical Almanac and for heads of the various nautical departments.

On September 20, 1894, Prof. William Harkness was appointed astronomical director. On June 30, 1897, he was also made director of the Nautical Almanac, after the resignation of Professor Hendrickson, who occupied the position for a short time after Professor Newcomb's retirement on March 12, 1897.

The work of the Observatory since its removal to the new site has included observations of the sun, moon, and planets and certain ephemeris stars (suspended from 1891 to 1894), observations of stars in the zone —15° 50′ to —18° 10′ of the Astronomische Gesellschaft, observations of selected stars with the prime vertical transit and the alt-azimuth, micrometric observations with the 26-inch and 12-inch telescopes. Some photographs of stellar spectra have been made with the spectrograph attached to the 26-inch telescope. The meteorological observations have been continued, but magnetic work (first seriously undertaken in 1881) has been given up, owing to disturbances caused by electric cars. Professor Yarnall's catalogue, containing the positions of all miscellaneous stars, observed with the mural circle and transit instrument between 1845 and 1877, was published in 1878 (second edition). A third edition has since been brought out by Professor Frisby. Professor Eastman's catalogue of 5,151 stars, observed between 1866 and 1891, appeared in 1898. Of this catalogue the astronomical director remarks that it "has absorbed the labors of about two-thirds of the Observatory staff for more than thirty years."

Leander McCormick Observatory, University of Virginia, Charlottesville, Ormond Stone, director.—The buildings are a rotunda, of 45 feet diameter, containing a 26-inch equatorial (a mate to the instrument in Washington), with computing rooms attached, containing library, clock, and chronograph; a small building containing a small equatorial and transit instrument; a residence for the director, and a small cottage for assistants.

The endowment yields an income of $4,455, of which $3,000 pays the salary of the director, and the remainder is used as a working fund.

The work consists principally of observations of satellites and nebulæ. In this work Professor Stone is assisted by the "fellows in astronomy," who are graduate students who occupy a portion only of their time in computing and observing. At present the "fellows" are Messrs. E. O. Eastwood, J. A. Lyon, jr., and Robert G. Robb.

Lowell Observatory, Flagstaff, Ariz., A. E. Douglass, assistant in charge.—The equipment is a wooden dome 40 feet in diameter, the movable part, 8½ tons in weight, floated on brine; a 24-inch Clark visual telescope; smaller visual telescopes, 6 inch, 4 inch, and a residence of six rooms.

The support is given entirely by Mr. Percival Lowell.

The chief work is "planeto-physics," the study of the physical condition of the planets, time having been especially given to Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, and Venus. A certain amount of double-star work has been done which is not expected to be continued permanently.

Halsted Observatory of Princeton University, Charles A. Young, director.—This observatory was built in 1867, but did not receive its telescope and equipment until 1882. The "observatory of instruction" connected with the director's house was built and fitted out in 1877.

There is no observatory fund. The salaries of Professor Young ($3,000) and Professor Reed ($1,500) are paid out of the general income of the university. The observatories have also an annual allowance of $500 from university funds for running expenses, fuel, lights, janitor, and electrical supplies. There is an astronomical fellowship ($10,000), which pays $400 a year to the "Thaw fellow in astronomy"—a graduate student.

Professor Reed's time is mostly given to instruction, but he does some work at the observatory in the way of spectrum photography and occasional observations of comets.

Professor Young's work has been substantially the same, but his impaired health has interfered, and no formal programme is attempted, but merely such occasional observations as are called for by some special astronomical occurrence—a new comet or an eclipse. It is to be hoped that it will not be long before the observatory will be suitably endowed with a sufficient income to permit it to be made a regularly working institution.

The building is of stone, with an iron dome 39 feet in diameter, the power for moving it and its sliding shutter being furnished by an electric motor and storage battery. The principal instrument is the great equatorial, of 23 inches aperture and 30 feet focal length, made by the Clarks. It is provided with all the usual accessories, micro-metric and spectroscopic. The building also contains a clock and a chronograph, and is in electric connection with the observatory of instruction. The observatory of instruction is devoted entirely to the use of students, and is fully equipped for its purpose. It possesses an equatorial (by Clark) of 9½ inches aperture, with a full complement of spectroscopic and other accessories. It has also a 9-inch reflector; a meridian circle with circles 2 feet in diameter and a 4-inch telescope; two transit instruments with 3-inch telescopes, both of them arranged for use as zenith telescopes; a 3-inch prime-vertical instrument; a chronograph; two standard clocks, and two chronometers. There are also a number of sextants, and all the other subsidiary apparatus required for carrying out the work involved in the courses on practical astronomy.

Chamberlin Observatory, University of Denver, Colorado, Herbert A. Howe, director.—The observatory has two buildings, costing together $29,000. The principal instrument is a 20-inch telescope of the highest class, which is being continually used in original research. Besides this there is a 6-inch equatorial and a 4-inch meridian circle, two clocks, two chronometers, a chronograph, and other subsidiary instruments. The entire plant cost $55,000. The observatory has no endowment. The donor intended to give it an endowment of $50,000, but his death has removed the last possibility of receiving this, and therefore the institution has no income apart from its connection with the University of Denver.

The university is responsible for the salary of the director of the observatory, but he also does some teaching of astronomy and higher mathematics in the College of Liberal Arts. It is, however, understood that as much of his time as possible must be given to the work of the observatory.

The principal line of work is the measurement of the positions of southern nebulæ, this being taken up at the request of a noted English astronomer, the work being done at no other observatory in the world. There are no assistants except young people who are students, and who are able to do routine computing and occasional observing.

The Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C., Samuel P. Langley, director.—The Astrophysical Observatory of the Smithsonian Institution has recently been greatly improved, and the equipment has been brought up to a state of unusual excellence. Its principal instrument is a 20-inch refractor. It is proposed to introduce a system of cooling by ammonia gas, to be regulated automatically, so that the apparatus can be maintained through the months of April, May, June, July, August, September, and October, as in the winter, at a standard, constant temperature. As much of the clear observing weather comes in these months, good results are hoped from this change.

In his latest published report Professor Langley summed up the result of the year's work by saying that "the positions of between 200 and 300 lines in the infra-red solar spectrum have been accurately established; an account of the researches of the observatory has been prepared for publication, and the instrumental equipment has reached a state of excellence never before equaled."

Dearborn University, Evanston, Ill., G. W. Hough, director.—The observatory building was erected in 1888 at a cost of $25,000. The residence for the director cost $7,000. The instruments are an 18½-inch refractor, costing $20,000; a 6½-inch Repsold meridian circle, costing $5,000; three astronomical clocks, a recording chronograph, a printing chronograph, and minor apparatus. The library has about 2,000 books and pamphlets.

The observatory has no separate endowment, but is supported out of the general funds of the Northwestern University.

The astronomical work is carried on by the director alone, who also gives instruction in general astronomy in the university. The work for twenty years has been especially directed to two lines, the study of the surface of the planet Jupiter and the discovery and measurement of double stars, 622 new pairs having been published. There have been made many observations for latitude and the occultation of stars by the moon.

Flower Observatory of the University of Pennsylvania, at Upper Darby, Pa., C. L. Doolittle, director.—The buildings are three in number: (1) The equatorial building, of brick and iron; (2) meridian building, of wood; (3) dwelling and library combined, also brick. The instruments consist of an 18-inch equatorial, 4-inch zenith telescope, 4-inch meridian circle, sidereal clock, chronograph, chronometers, alt-azimuth, small transit instrument, and spectroscope.

There is no independent income. The observatory is a department of the University of Pennsylvania, and every member of the staff is employed during a number of hours every week in the work of instruction. A series of latitude observations has been kept up almost continually since the mounting of the zenith telescope three years ago, by Professor Doolittle. The equatorial is kept constantly employed by Assistant Eric Doolittle in the measurement of double stars and by Assistant Henry R. Evans in observation of comets and minor planets.

Goodsell Observatory of Carleton College, Northfield, Minn., William W. Payne, director.—The photographs sent to the board of visitors show: Goodsell Observatory, 100 feet by 78 feet; cost, $30,000. The Williams equatorial, 16-inch object glass, 22 feet focal length; cost, $15,000. Eye end of large equatorial, showing spectroscope, heliostat, and battery; cost, $1,000. Repsold meridian circle; cost, $5,000. Photographic triplet; cost, $3,800.

The star catalogue shows the meridian work. Popular Astronomy, a regular publication, is issued at Goodsell Observatory. For twenty-two years the observatory has given the time of the observatory to the Northwest, reaching from Chicago to the Pacific coast, and the time signals now cover over 13,000 miles of railroad telegraph lines. Lantern slides are made from the negatives for lectures and instruction purposes, and prominent instructors in the United States purchase these on account of the quality of the work.

Lowe Observatory, Echo Mountain, Cal., Lewis Swift, director.—The equipment is a 16-inch refractor by the Clarks, 22-foot focus steel tube, finder, driving clock, filar micrometer, and eye-pieces, cost $11,000; spectroscope by Brashear, prism and grating ruled to 13,400 lines to the inch, $1,000; sidereal clock by the Howards, electric break-circuit, $450; automatic right-ascension circles, $100; astronomical library, $1,000; observing chair, bookcases, furniture, tools, etc., $450; making in all, $14,000.

The dome room is 30 feet in diameter; library, waiting room, and bedroom, probable cost, $4,000.

The work done is the same formerly prosecuted by Professor Swift at the Warner Observatory, Rochester, N. Y., namely, the discovery of nebulæ and comets. While there were 900 nebulæ and 10 comets discovered and published in various astronomical journals in this country and Europe before this observatory was built, five and a half years ago, there have since been discovered by Professor Swift, and catalogued and published 350 nebulæ and 7 comets. For the discovery of nebulæ it is claimed that Professor Swift stands next to Sir John Herschel. The instruments are his, having been brought from Rochester, and the observatory belongs to the Pasadena and Mount Lowe Railway Company. It has no endowment and there is no assistant. It is the only observatory in southern California, but unless the company purchases the equipment it will probably go to some college in the Southern States, as far south as possible, there being no sufficient astronomical observatory in the South, except the one at the University of Virginia.

For his discoveries Professor Swift has received 9 medals, 3 of gold from Austria, 1 of silver from France, 1 large bronze one from England, and 4 other bronze medals from California Academy of Science.

Washburn Observatory, Madison, Wis., George C. Comstock, director.—The Washburn Observatory, connected with the University of Wisconsin, is under the directorship of Professor Comstock; was established in 1878 through the munificence of the late Governor C. C. Washburn. Although its obligations and opportunities as a branch of a teaching university have not been ignored, the energies of its staff from the beginning have been directed mainly to astronomical research. Among its lines are the measurement of the positions and motions of the heavenly bodies, the discovery and measurement of double stars, the investigation of variable stars, the study of changes of latitude and of the amount and character of the atmospheric refraction, the determination of the amount of the aberration of light, and a systematic investigation of the parallaxes of all accessible stars which have large proper motions; and there is also maintained a tridaily meteorological service.

The principal instruments are: An equatorially mounted telescope of 15½ inches aperture, constructed by Alvan Clark & Sons, and provided with graduated circles, driving clock, a filar micrometer, double image micrometer by Steinheil, a spectroscope, astrophotometer, and a very complete set of eyepieces; a meridian circle, by A. Repsold & Sons, of Hamburg, with collimators, transit micrometer, and the usual accessories of such an instrument. This instrument is figured in the last edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica as the type of its class. The objective of the instrument was made by the Clarks, and has an aperture of 4.8 inches and a focal length of 58 inches. The circle is graduated to 2 minutes of arc. For the past three years this instrument has been employed for an extensive series of determinations of stellar parallax. A floating mirror has been added to it as an auxiliary for the determination of its horizontal points and flexures. There are also a sidereal clock, by Höhwü, of Amsterdam; two meantime clocks, by Howard, of Boston, all excellent timepieces, and a chronograph, by Fauth & Co., of Washington.

In the students' observatory are mounted a 6-inch equatorial telescope by Alvan Clark & Sons, a combined transit and zenith telescope by Fauth & Co., and a transit instrument of the broken telescope type by Bamberg. The equatorial telescope has been provided with reflecting prisms (Loewy) and is employed in an investigation of the refraction and the constant of aberration, and the Bamberg instrument is used for latitude determinations by the Talcott method and for the time service of the observatory. The observatory also possesses subsidiary instruments, such as chronometers, sextants, an engineers' transit, an alt-azimuth, a universal instrument of the German type, a spherometer caliper, seismoscopes, and a complete set of meteorological instruments.

The peculiar line of work of the observatory is upon the positions and motions of the "fixed" stars.

Harvard Observatory, of Harvard College, located at Cambridge, Mass., Edward C. Pickering, director.—The Harvard Observatory grounds cover 7 acres, having an estimated value of $50,000. These grounds are too small and too near thickly settled portions of the city. The buildings at Cambridge are valued at $52,000. They are very inadequate, and for the most part are not fireproof. A house is provided for the director, but the rent is deducted from his salary. A machine shop is provided for the instrument maker. The annual income is $16,000.

The climate of Cambridge is not suitable for astronomical observations of the highest grade. Harvard has therefore established a secondary station at Arequipa, Peru, at a height of 8,000 feet, selected, after careful study, as the location in which the atmospheric conditions are more favorable than had been found in any other part of the world. The Harvard buildings at Arequipa are valued at $12,000. Six meteorological stations, extending from the sea level to a height of 19,200 feet, are associated with the observatory. The Harvard Observatory is also closely related with the Blue Hill Meteorological Observatory.

The principal instruments at Cambridge are the 15-inch equatorial telescope, the 15-inch reflector, the 12-inch meridian photometer, the 11-inch Draper telescope, the 8-inch transit circle, the 8-inch Draper doublet, the 6-inch equatorial telescope, and the 4-inch transit photometer. The principal instruments at Arequipa are the 24-inch Bruce doublet, the 13-inch Boyden visual and photographic equatorial telescope, the 8-inch Bache doublet, the 4-inch meridian photometer, and the 4-inch transit photometer. The 8-inch transit circle is not now in regular use, but with it two of the international zones have been observed. All of the other instruments are in regular use every clear night, nearly all of them until dawn, and the work done with them is not duplicated elsewhere.

In addition to a large amount of general astronomical scientific work, the Harvard Observatory is engaged in special work in photometry, photography, and meridian-circle observations. The Harvard directors, in addition to their work in the daytime, have always taken part in the observations, the work for the last twenty-four years averaging over four hours on every clear evening. The observations consist mainly of large pieces of routine work, planned by the directors and astronomers, who may also make the observations, but the great labor of computation and reduction is done by the assistant astronomers and computers.

Later in these remarks I shall speak of the work in stellar photography done at this observatory and the great value of the Draper photographs.

Mississippi University, Oxford, Chancellor R. B. Fulton, director.—Under date of July 6, 1891, it was reported in the Sidereal Messenger, No. 97, that a "twin equatorial" (a 15-inch visual telescope and a 9-inch photographic telescope side by side on the same mounting) was under construction by Grubb. [Smithsonian Report, 1892, page 732.] The "twin equatorial" here mentioned is now in use at the observatory of the University of Mississippi.

Litchfield Observatory of Hamilton College, Clinton, N. Y., S. J. Saunders, director.—The Edwin Litchfield Observatory has long held an important scientific repute. Here Dr. Christian H. F. Peters discovered 48 asteroids and did other work even more valuable and of international fame. (Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia, volume 4, page 125.)

There are various unpublished papers of Dr. Peters, and recently steps have been taken by Professor Holden, Prof. E. C. Pickering, and the Secretary of War (Mr. Root) to promote their publication.

The Litchfield Observatory is equipped with a 13½-inch refractor.

Columbia University astronomical observatory, city of New York, John K. Rees, director.—From 1883 to 1898 the observatory of Columbia College was on top of the library building at Forty-ninth street, near Madison avenue, and possessed an equatorial refractor of 13 inches aperture, transit instruments, spectroscopes, and other instruments. Since December, 1898, when the property in Forty-ninth street was sold, the instruments in the old observatory have been removed to the new site at One hundred and twentieth street, where they are now stored in the cellar of one of the buildings. At the new site was erected in 1892 a small house in which is a zenith telescope of 3 inches aperture, which has been used for the past seven years in observations for latitude. In 1899 was erected at the new site a little house for use of transit instruments and chronographs.

The financial resources of this department are received from the university funds and from outsiders; the trustees contribute for the running of this department about $10,000 a year, and friends have in the past seven years added to the trustees' contributions $30,000.

The special work during the past eight years has been the reduction and measurement of the Rutherford photographs, the measurement of the Rutherford plates not measured by Rutherford, observations for the purpose of determining the latitude at New York City and a new determination for the constant of aberration of light, and measurements and reductions of photographs taken of the stars about the North and South Pole.

The departmental force consists of J. K. Rees, professor of astronomy and director of observatory; H. Jacoby, adjunct professor of astronomy, and Dr. S. A. Mitchell, tutor in astronomy. This force is assisted by four computers, whose services are paid for out of the funds raised outside the university by the director of the observatory.

Allegheny Observatory, Western University of Pennsylvania, Allegheny, Pa., F. L. O. Wadsworth, director.—Its principal instrument is a 13-inch refractor.

There are post-graduate courses of instruction in astronomy and astrophysics.

Detroit Observatory, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Mich., A. Hall, jr., director.—The building is old fashioned, with two wings, with the 12¼-inch equatorial in a dome on top of the central portion. In the east wing is a 6½-inch Pistor & Martins meridian circle. In the west wing is the library, attached to which is the dwelling house for the professor of astronomy. There is also a small practice observatory containing a 6-inch equatorial, a 3-inch meridian transit, 2 chronometers, a sextant, and a surveyor's transit.

The observatory has no funds of its own. Professor Hall and one assistant on the list of teachers give about half of their time to instruction.

Professor Hall has been at work in his special field on aberration constant with meridian circle. His salary is $2,500. One assistant receives $300, and the repairs of instruments and buildings cost about $700, making $3,500, about one-half of which is chargeable to teaching.

Morrison University, Glasgow, Mo., C. W. Pritchett, director.—The building, erected in 1875, is 81 feet in length and has four divisions—the equatorial tower, containing insulated pier, and surmounted by revolving dome, for the equatorial made by Clark, 17 feet focal length, and 12¼-inch aperture; west of the equatorial is transit-circle room, containing meridian circle, by Troughton & Simms (6-inch aperture, 24-inch circle), London; collimators, sidereal clock (Fordsham), and chronograph; west of transit-circle room is the library and computing room (2,500 volumes).

The money for the observatory was the gift of Miss Berenice Morrison, who gave for this purpose $50,000, of which $23,000 was invested in building and instruments and $27,000 is invested for support. She also gave $50,000 for the Pritchett School.

The founding and direction has been in Professor Pritchett's hands all these years. During that time much good work has been done, as the publications will show. His sons, Prof. H. S. Pritchett, of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, and C. W. Pritchett, jr., mining engineer in Mexico, were with him, and they gave a good account of their work. Now, however, Professor Pritchett, at the age of 77, can only do routine work, and can not be expected to solicit money to enable him to employ the needed assistants.

Emerson McMillin Observatory, Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, Henry C. Lord, director.—The Emerson McMillin Observatory of the Ohio State University was founded by Mr. Emerson McMillin, of New York. The instruments are a 12½-inch equatorial telescope, mounting by Warner & Swasey, objective by Mr. Brashear; a large and powerful spectroscope by Mr. Brashear (this instrument being adapted to use either one or two prisms or a grating and provided with a double set of objectives, one corrected for the visual and one for the photographic rays); a positive micrometer with 7-inch circle, by Warner & Swasey; a combined zenith telescope and transit instrument of 3 inches clear aperture by G. N. Saegmuller; a sidereal clock by Clemens Rieffler, of Munich; a comparator by Carl Zeiss; a 4-inch portable equatorial by Alvan Clark; a chronograph by Warner & Swasey; sextants, chronometers, meteorological instruments, etc.

The research work has been largely in the field of astrophysics and in the determination of motion in line of sight. Of the 56 stars whose motion in the line of sight has been determined, 5 of these have been determined at the Emerson McMillin Observatory.

The director of this observatory is Prof. Henry C. Lord, assisted by a fellow of the university.

Dudley Observatory, Albany, N. Y., Lewis Boss, director.—The buildings are the observatory building proper, brick, 67 feet by 34 feet, two floors with attic, equatorial tower of 22 feet diameter; the dwelling house of brick, connected with the observatory by a corridor with bookcase; transit-circle house, 22 feet by 24 feet, frame and inside covering of steel and iron, outside of wood, louver work on vertical walls, roof in six sliding sections.

The instruments are transit circle by Pistor & Martens, 1856—cleaned and slightly altered in 1893; focal length, 119 inches; objective, 8 inches; two 40-inch circles graduated to 2'. Mire objective, 8 inches; focal length, 287 feet. Instrument 43 years old; still of the first rank.

The equatorial telescope, optical parts by Brashear, mechanical by Warner & Swasey, adapted both for photography and for visual work; focal lengths, visual, 15 feet; photographic, 13 feet; objectives, 12 inches in diameter; one comet seeker, two chronographs, and three clocks.

The financial means and income are: Endowment, $110,000; annual income from investments, $4,700; from gifts and other sources, at present, about $1,000.

The work is as follows: Formerly many planetary and cometary observations and computations were made in addition to the regular meridian and star work, but this has not been kept up during the past three years. Preliminary essays in astronomical photography now take up part of the attention of this observatory. Meridian observations, and calculations growing out of such work, constitute the principal occupation of the observatory. The published works are: Catalogue of 500 Stars (chiefly standard stars); Catalogue of 8,241 Stars (A. G. Zones), published by the International Astronomical Society; several star catalogues and many papers on stellar astronomy in the Astronomical Journal.

The observations are now completed for a catalogue of 11,000 southern stars, and the reductions for these are in a forward state. The equivalent of ten years' work by one person has already been expended on a compilation of facts relating to the positions and motions of 20,000 stars, including those known to have sensible motion and those of seventh magnitude or brighter. The observation and discussion of these is now on the programme and parts of them already in hand.

The observatory staff consists of the director, Prof. Lewis Boss, and two assistants, and about $750 is now expended annually for routine computation by outside assistance, the force being too small for the full operation of the plant.

The West Point Military Academy Observatory, Prof. Peter S. Michie, director.—General and practical astronomy form portions of the present course of instruction. The astronomical apparatus includes a 12-inch refracting telescope.

The report for 1896 of the superintendent gives a statement of the present course and method of instruction, the organization of the personnel, descriptions of recitations, class reports, and a critical historical review of the institution, and claims that—

> For many years this Academy has been the model for other scientific institutions. Astronomy in this country was nurtured here. Trigonometrical and topographical surveying, methods of triangulation, magnetic declination, and the systems of locating, surveying, and dividing the public lands of the United States are some of the branches which emanated from this Academy. Methods of field astronomy and some of the most valuable instruments of precision have been developed and invented by graduates of West Point.

Ladd Observatory of Brown University, Providence, R. I., Winslow Upton, director.—This observatory was built and equipped in 1890 by ex-Governor Ladd, of Rhode Island. The building is of brick, with copper dome and wooden ell, costing upward of $25,000.

The instruments are a 12-inch refractor with micrometer, spectroscope, helioscope, and eyepieces; 3-inch combined transit and zenith telescope, two high-grade clocks, chronograph, chronometer, sextants, and minor apparatus; recording barometer, thermometer, hygrometer, rain gague, and ordinary meteorological instruments—valued at $10,000.

The financial means are provided by Brown University from its general fund and there is no independent income.

The work is chiefly as adjunct to the instruction in astronomy at Brown University, undergraduate and graduate. There is local service by constant signals day and night, requiring regular transit observations and clock comparisons. There are continuous meteorological records and miscellaneous observations as opportunity offers.

The force is Professor Upton, with one assistant, Mr. John Edwards.

Vassar College Observatory, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Mary W. Whitney, director.—There is a brick building containing a 12-inch telescope, equatorially mounted, and with the usual equipment; also a small spectroscope; a 4-inch transit circle, with the usual equipment; a small wood structure containing a 5-inch telescope, equatorially mounted, for the special use of students. There is also a Repsold measuring machine for the study of stellar photographic plates, which was a gift.

There is no income for the observational work of the observatory. There is a college endowment for the department of instruction, out of which the salaries of the teachers are paid. Occasional appropriations are made by the trustees of the college, but these are also, for the most part, for the work of instruction.

The observatorial work for publication (Astronomical Journal and Astronomische Nachrichten) involves mainly micrometer work on asteroids and comets.

Observers, Mary W. Whitney, director, and Caroline E. Furness, assistant. Work is also done with the Repsold machine on stellar plates. At present a series of polar plates taken at Helsingfors, Finland, by Dr. Downer, is being reduced by Miss Furness.

Wesleyan University Observatory, Middletown, Conn., John M. Van Vleck, director.—The observatory contains a 12-inch refracting telescope, by Alvan Clark & Sons, and well-appointed laboratories, with chemical and physical apparatus and cabinets, illustrating the departments of geology and natural history, furnish the undergraduate with facilities for the study of physical science. (Johnson's Universal Cyclopedia, volume 8, page 712.)

The Daniel Scholl Observatory of the Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Pa., Jefferson E. Kershner, director.—The principal instrument in the Daniel Scholl Observatory is an 11-inch Clark-Repsold equatorial with micrometer. In addition to this the Observatory is provided with a 3-inch transit instrument by Ertel & Son, a Fauth chronograph, a Seth Thomas precision clock, and a chronometer, together with a set of meteorological instruments. The meteorological apparatus is used to make a record of the state of the weather, which is regularly reported to the office of the Pennsylvania State Weather Service. A universal instrument with 10-inch circles, reading to seconds, a student's telescope, and an additional cylinder for the chronograph have been secured—instruments more especially available for the purpose of studying the problems of time, longitude, latitude, and azimuth. The equatorial was made in Germany by the Repsolds; the objective by the Clarks, of Cambridge, Mass. The workmanship is of the finest, and the instrument one of the best in the country of its size.

Smith Observatory, Geneva, N. Y., William R. Brooks, director.—The Smith Observatory was erected at Geneva in 1888 by William Smith, esq., and has ever since been maintained by him "for the increase and diffusion of astronomical knowledge." The observatory is a strong tower, 17 feet in diameter and 34 feet in height, surmounted by a revolving dome. Below are a reception room and a room for the fine meridian circle (by Warner & Swasey) and the astronomical clock; above, under the dome, stands the large equatorial telescope, a refractor of 10 inches aperture, with a photographic lens of the same size. The telescope was made by Clancey, of Boston, and the dome was built by Warner & Swasey, of Cleveland, Ohio, makers of the great Lick and Yerkes telescopes.

As director of the observatory, Mr. Smith early secured the services of Prof. William R. Brooks, whose remarkable cometary discoveries have given this observatory its wide reputation. The privileges of this observatory have been placed at the disposal of the students of Hobart College.

Lawrence University Observatory, Appleton, Wis., F. E. Millis, director.—The observatory is thoroughly equipped with the finest instruments for astronomical work. (Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia, volume 5, page 143.)

The Underwood Observatory in connection with Lawrence University at Appleton, Wis., was equipped at the opening of the college year of 1892-93. The outfit consists of a 10-inch Clark equatorial, 4-inch meridian circle, mean-time and sidereal clocks, chronometer, and chronograph. A local time service has been established. (Smithsonian Report, 1892, page 735.)

Bucknell University Observatory, Lewisburg, Pa., W. C. Bartol, director.—The main college building is situated on a hill 100 feet above the Susquehanna River and was designed by Thomas U. Walter, architect of the Dome and wings of the Capitol at Washington, D. C. The observatory was erected in 1887, and is designed for the use of students in practical astronomy.

The equipment represents the latest improvements in astronomical instruments. It consists of a Clark equatorial telescope of 10 inches aperture and 12½ feet focal length, furnished with a fine position micrometer and all the usual accessories; a spectroscope, with prism and grating by Brashear, the grating having 14,500 lines to the inch; a 3-inch prismatic transit, with a 13-wire movable micrometer by T. Ertel & Sons; a Fauth chronograph with Bond spring governor; a Waldo precision clock for sidereal time, with mercurial compensation, break-circuiting apparatus; Daniell's battery and telegraph sounders; a Seth Thomas clock for solar time; a sextant; a 3-inch altitude azimuth refractor; a set of meteorological instruments; celestial globes and maps, and standard works on theoretical and practical astronomy. Astronomy is treated not merely as an application of mathematics, but as a science which forms an essential part of a finished education.

The observatory work is in charge of Professor Bartol, assisted by R. L. Rentz, A. B., and by one of the students of the college. Observations are made for time and to determine the errors of the transit instrument, for azimuth, and for latitude and longitude. There is a free use by the students of the 10-inch equatorial telescope, and the use of the micrometer is taught.

Haverford Observatory of Haverford College, Haverford, Pa., William H. Collins, director.—Besides the two chief college halls there are two well-furnished astronomical observatories. (Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia, volume 4, pages 173, 174.)

Haverford Observatory has a 10-inch refractor, and good work has been done on stellar parallax and sun-spot observations.

Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md., S. Newcomb, director.—A course in general astronomy is offered as an elective for third-year students. For those students who wish to take astronomy as a subordinate subject a general outline course is given each year. There is also given every year a more advanced course. The advanced courses vary from year to year. (Education Report, 1897-98, pages 883, 884.)

The principal instrument in use at Johns Hopkins Observatory is a 9.5-inch equatorial telescope.

Smith Observatory, Beloit College, Beloit, Wis., Clement Rood, director.—The Smith Observatory contains a 9.5-inch refractor, the principal work of the institution consisting of sun-spot observations.

Shattuck Observatory, Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., Edwin B. Frost, director.—The building known as the Shattuck Observatory of Dartmouth College was erected in 1854, and has not been enlarged since that date. It is a small building, with three wings, each about 12 by 18 feet, with a small dome for the 9.4-inch equatorial telescope.

In addition to the 9.4-inch equatorial and its spectroscopic accessories, the observatory is equipped with a 4-inch meridian circle, by Troughton & Sims, London; a sidereal clock and chronograph, a mean-time clock, a sextant, and several small telescopes of ancient construction.

The salaries of the instructors are paid from the regular college budget. Since 1898 the income of $10,000 has been given for the scientific use of the observatory, and will be chiefly used to improve and increase the instrumental equipment.

The observatory is at present used only for purposes of instruction by Professor Frost during an annual three months' winter leave of absence from the Yerkes Observatory, and by a resident instructor (during the past year), Mr. J. M. Poor.

Hartford Public High School Observatory, Hartford, Conn., B. S. Annis, director.—The principal instrument in use at the Hartford High School Observatory is a telescope having an object glass 9½ inches aperture, 11 feet 4 inches focal length, by Alvan Clark & Sons, Cambridge, Mass.; equatorial, with driving clock inside the pedestal, by Warner & Swasey, Cleveland, Ohio. The telescope is used to exhibit celestial objects to classes of students. It is in charge of Miss Clara A. Pease and B. S. Annis, A. M., professor of mathematics and astronomy.

Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C., G. M. Searle, director.—A small observatory has been built and is under the direction of Rev. G. M. Searle. The telescope is 9 inches aperture, 9 feet focus, glass and tube by Clacey, mounting by Saegmuller (Fauth & Co.). The cells and centerpiece of tube are made of aluminum. A small meridian circle and photographic and spectroscopic apparatus will also be provided. A 5-inch telescope is now in use. (Smithsonian Report, 1890, page 167.)

Hobart College observatories, Geneva, N. Y., H. L. Smith and William R. Brooks, directors.—Hobart College has two observatories—the smaller, now the private property of Prof. H. L. Smith, which he intends to give to the college, and the Smith Observatory, erected in 1888 by William Smith, esq., and hereafter described.

Students in practical astronomy receive instruction in the use of the instruments and in actual observation. To facilitate this the smaller observatory was erected near the college buildings. It contains an equatorial telescope of 6 inches aperture, by Brashear, driven by clockwork, as is also the A. R. circle, and furnished with three micrometers (one filar and two double image rock crystal), solar and stellar prisms, and a spectroscope.

Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., William J. Vaughn, director.—The observatory building is amply large for the housing of the instruments and the giving of room for computing and class work.

The equatorial is 8½ inches aperture, the meridian or transit circle is 5 inches aperture, and there are also an alt-azimuth, and stellar and solar spectroscopes and two clocks.

The observatory has no endowment, and the instruments are used only for teaching purposes.

Yale University Observatory, New Haven, Conn., W. L. Elkin, director.—The observatory consists of one brick building, containing offices, library, laboratory, clock room, and two bedrooms. Connected with it are outbuildings, containing the instruments, a transit instrument, a 6-inch heliometer, an 8-inch refractor, and a photographic apparatus, of a total cost of about $25,000.

The observatory has at present an annual income of about $7,000, derived $5,000 from the endowment created by the late Prof. Elias Loomis, $1,000 from distribution of time signals, and $1,000 from testing thermometers.

The work is carried on by Prof. W. L. Elkin, director; by Dr. Chase, astronomer; by Mr. Brown, secretary, and by Mr. Smith, assistant. It consists, in part, of researches with the heliometer on stellar parallax and triangulations, and with the photographic apparatus on meteors; also of time determination and thermometer testing. No teaching is done as observatory work.

Durfee High School, Fall River, Mass., Iram N. Smith, director.—The Durfee High School has an 8-inch equatorial telescope, made by Warner & Swasey, lenses by Clark, of Cambridge, with clockwork attached, in an observatory dome about 15 feet in diameter and 100 feet from the ground. The work consists of astronomical observations by pupils and occasional observations by the public.

Iowa College Observatory, Grinnell, Iowa, S. J. Buck, director.—Practical astronomy is a part of the requirement at Iowa College. The observatory is under the charge of S. J. Buck, who fills the chair of mathematics and astronomy in the college.

The apparatus consists of an Alvan Clark refracting telescope with an 8-inch object glass, mounted equatorially and provided with driving clock; a 6-inch reflecting telescope by Brashear; two Seth Thomas precision astronomical clocks, one set upon sidereal time, electrically connected with a Fauth chronograph, the other upon mean sun time, from which time is given to the college; a Warner & Swasey micrometer, with wires electrically lighted; a Fauth transit provided with two circles, one reading to minutes of arc, the other to ten seconds and having a micrometer reading to one-quarter second of arc; a chronometer from Negus. The sun clock is provided with a correcting electrical coil to bring it into daily accord with central time. Time is given to the college by electric bells automatically connected with the solar clock, the chapel bell being so rung. The instruments of the observatory are used for observation work, and computations are made. Advanced students in practical astronomy aid in furnishing time for the institution. Weather Bureau observations are made with Government instruments, weather flags are mounted in accordance with telegrams, and daily weather charts are received.

Mount Holyoke College, South Hadley, Mass., Miss A. S. Young, director.—The apparatus in Williston Observatory, Mount Holyoke Seminary and College, comprises a refractor of 8 inches aperture. The chief work consists of sun-spot observations.

University of Alabama, Tuscaloosa, Ala., H. A. Sayre, director.—The building is of brick and contains four rooms. In one of these is placed the equatorial, in another the transit instrument. The equatorial is an 8-inch telescope. This and the transit were good in their day, but both were made and installed long before 1861, and, together with the astronomical clocks and the chronograph, are not satisfactory instruments for use at the present day, and the entire equipment ought to be renewed if useful astronomical observations are to be pursued.

There is no independent means or income. The university as a whole has a fair and growing income, the growth of which is to be provided for, it is hoped, by royalties on mineral lands granted by the act of Congress of April 23, 1884.

With the present instruments it is not possible to undertake work of permanent value. They are used for instruction purposes by Dr. H. A. Sayre, who is a thorough and enthusiastic scientist and capable of independent and original work, which would add materially to the advancement of the science of astronomy. A new astronomical observatory at the South is very much and specially needed; and if the Lowe Observatory at Echo Mountain, Cal., is not to be maintained, Professor Swift's instruments might most wisely be transferred to the University of Alabama.

Holden Memorial Observatory of Syracuse University, Syracuse, N. Y., Henry A. Peck, director.—The observatory is the astronomical department of Syracuse University, and was founded in 1887 by E. F. Holden in memory of his son, a graduate of the university. In addition to the building and equipment, Mr. Holden also gave $25,000, the income of which is to be used for maintenance.

The principal instruments are an 8-inch Alvan Clark refractor, furnished with full sets of eyepieces, driving clock, filar micrometer, and also lamella micrometers for faint planets; 3-inch Troughton & Sons reversible transit; Strasser & Rohde sidereal clock with electrical contacts; Dent year-time chronometer; Fauth chronograph; spectroscope made by Brashear for use on the 8-inch Clark refractor from special measurements and drawings, using both prisms and Rowland grating; also sextants and other small apparatus for purposes of instruction.

The professor of astronomy is H. A. Peck, who received his astronomical training mainly with Prof. E. Becker, at the Imperial Observatory in Strasburg, Germany. He has published various papers and is at present engaged on the orbit of Gale's comet.

Annapolis Observatory, United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., C. W. Bartlett, director.—Instruction in astronomy forms a part of the course at the United States Naval Academy. The departments of study are amply illustrated by models and apparatus of all kinds. The astronomical observatory contains a large collection of instruments, including an equatorial telescope with an aperture of 7.75 inches.

Observatory of the University of Missouri, Columbia, Mo., J. N. Fellows, director.—This observatory was first built in 1853, and then consisted of a small wooden structure, in which were mounted a 4-inch Fitz equatorial, a 2⅛-inch transit by Brunner, a sidereal clock, and other smaller instruments. It was used for the purpose of instructing students in astronomy, and few changes or additions were made till 1880, when a 7½-inch equatorial by Merz & Mahler was bought. The building was then removed to another part of the college grounds and enlarged by the erection of a brick tower with a dome for the newly acquired telescope. Soon after a sidereal clock, a chronograph, and spectroscope, all by Fauth & Co., were purchased. A 2-inch alt-azimuth, by Blunt, of New York, had been bought some years before.

Excellent work has been done here by Prof. Milton Updegraff, now transferred to the Naval Observatory, in the observation of planets and comets, besides a redetermination of latitude and longitude, the latter by telegraphic connection with the observatory of Washington University, St. Louis. (See Smithsonian Report, 1892, page 726.)

Amherst College Observatory, Amherst, Mass., David P. Todd, director.—This observatory contains a 7½-inch telescope by Alvan Clark, an alt-azimuth, two transits for meridian observations, surveying and engineering instruments, a 12-inch reflector, and much other apparatus, chiefly of use on eclipse expeditions. The observatory and its equipment are maintained both for educational purposes and for original research. Professor of Astronomy David P. Todd is in charge, but is now absent at Tripoli to observe the solar eclipse in May. Connected with the observatory is the division of practical meteorology, in which observations of the chief meteorological elements are systematically conducted in continuance of the work begun in 1835 by the late Professor Snell, and maintained without interruption to the present time. A bequest of the late Charles T. Wilder, of Wellesley Hills, has enabled the trustees to purchase an excellent site near the college, upon which it is hoped that a new observatory with a thoroughly modern equipment may soon be erected.

Boston University Observatory, J. B. Coit, director.—The building is an observatory room and dome for the equatorial telescope.

The instruments are the equatorial refractor, with object glass of 7.1 diameter. The glass is by Clacey, the mounting and driving clock by Saegmuller. Filar position micrometer. Polarizing helioscope and other solar pieces and attachments. Universal spectroscope by Brashear. Barometer, thermometers, chronometer.

The financial means are the general university funds and occasional donations.

The work is photographic, spectroscopic study of solar phenomena by the director, Prof. J. B. Coit; visual study of the sun by students in astronomy, and miscellaneous work.

Washington University, St. Louis, Mo., William H. Roever, director.—The observatory of Washington University, in charge of Mr. William H. Roever, is situated in one of the busiest parts of the city of St. Louis, and it has, therefore, become impossible to use it conveniently except for instruction. The observatory contains the following instruments: An equatorial, 6½-inch aperture; transit instrument, 3-inch aperture; chronograph; a break-circuit clock, mean time; a break-circuit clock, siderial; chronometers; an alt-azimuth instrument, mounted as a meridian circle; temperature boxes for thermometric and horological work, and complete equipment for electrical time service.

Bates College Observatory, Lewiston, Me., George C. Chase, director.—In laboratory work the students of Bates College have opportunity to use a variety of instruments and pieces of apparatus, including quadrant, sextant, alt-azimuth, gnomon, box-transit, telescope with 6.25-inch aperture, and spectroscope.

University of California, Student's Observatory, Berkeley, Cal., Armin O. Leuschner, director.—This observatory conducts the practical and theoretical training of students desiring to enter the profession of astronomy. In connection with the work of instruction a large amount of important astronomical work is turned out by students and instructors, who assist the Lick Observatory in its regular work.

The equipment of the observatory consists chiefly of a 6-inch refractor, a zenith and transit telescope, an alt-azimuth instrument, electrical connections for the determination of time and longitude, a Howard mean-time clock, chronometers, and a number of sextants.

Meteorological and seismic observations are regularly taken.

From time to time observations on comets and asteroids are published. The study of the variation of latitude has been commenced by two advanced students, and a long series of observations has already been secured. The advanced classes compute and send to Cambridge preliminary orbits of newly discovered comets, on the basis of the first three observations, which are regularly telegraphed to the Students' Observatory from the Lick Observatory. Many were distributed with ephemeris from Cambridge before the calculations were completed at other places.

A graduate student and former instructor has published the first part of an Investigation of the Definitive Orbit of Comet 1894 IV (E. Swift), including perturbations, with a view of settling the question of its identity with De Vico's comet. Dr. Townley is investigating the perturbations of an asteroid. Five graduate students are engaged on comet orbits, and other work is in progress. The staff of the observatory consists of Professor Leuschner, Dr. Townley, instructor, and two student assistants.

Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, Pa., Miss S. J. Cunningham, director.—Swarthmore College is a coeducational institution, founded by the Society of Friends of Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, for the purpose of furnishing opportunities for higher education to its own members and to persons of other denominations. Women as well as men are members of its faculty and of the board of managers. Besides the main building, there is a spacious science building containing the chemical laboratory, the physical laboratory for teaching electrical engineering, the drafting room, shops of engineering department, and an astronomical observatory. (Johnson's Universal Cyclopædia.)

The principal astronomical instrument in the Swarthmore Observatory is a telescope of 6 inches aperture.

Knox College Observatory, Galesburg, Ill., Charles B. Thwing, director.—The observatory of Knox College is a small one, useful for illustrative purposes, but not equipped for work. It is in charge of Charles B. Thwing, professor of physics and astronomy, and contains a 6-inch equatorial by Clark, mounted with driving clock in dome, a theodolite, two sextants, and a globe.

Central High School Observatory, Philadelphia, Pa., Monroe B. Snyder, director.—The old observatory of the Central High School is equipped with a 6-inch telescope and a complete list of spectroscopic apparatus, clocks, and chronographs. A unique set of cameras with spherical plates are nearing completion by Brashear, which it was intended to use in the observations of the total solar eclipse of May 28, 1900, but this can not be done because the city has not provided the mountings and other necessary appliances. A fine new observatory building is being constructed at Broad and Green streets, directly opposite the old observatory, but the equipment is far from complete. An 8-inch equatorial by Brashear is in place, but without the observing chair and other appointments. A 4-inch transit circle is also set up, but in an unfinished building and can not be used. The full equipment will include a 15-inch telescope, to which a spectroheliograph is to be attached. The work planned is largely of an astrophysical character—solar observations; spectroscopic and photometric work. Philadelphia can not without discredit longer delay the completion of this admirably planned observatory.

Bowdoin College Observatory, Brunswick, Me., C. C. Hutchins, director.—The observatory of Bowdoin College, built in 1890, consists of a tower 24 feet in diameter, capped by a revolving dome about 26 feet in height, in which is placed a 6-inch telescope, with a good equipment of eyepieces and apparatus for photographic and spectroscopic work. The objective was made by Wray, of London. The telescope is driven by a clock capable of giving either lunar or stellar motion. In a wing adjoining the tower is set a good meridian circle or transit instrument, which has an object glass 5.4 centimeters in diameter. In addition to the instruments already described the observatory has a 12-inch reflecting telescope with its fittings, and it has both sidereal and mean solar clocks and several sextants. The work in astronomy comprises a practical course at the observatory, including determination of latitude by solar and lunar observations, determination of longitude, rating of sidereal clock by transit observations and meridian-circle observations. In the absence of Professor Hutchins, Mr. John E. Burbank has charge of the astronomical work.

The Creighton University Observatory, Omaha, Nebr., William F. Rigge, director.—The building consists of two portions—an equatorial and a transit room. The former is cylindrical in shape and carries a sheet-iron dome. The telescope, made by Steward, of London, is equatorially mounted and provided with divided circles, a driving clock, seven eyepieces, a micrometer, and the necessary clamps and slow-motion screws on both axes. The lens is excellent and of 5 inches aperture. The transit room is square and faced with brick inside and outside like the equatorial room. In the center is a 3-inch transit circle, by Fauth & Co., which serves the triple purpose of transit instrument, meridian circle, and zenith telescope.

In the angle between the equatorial and transit rooms a vault houses a Howard mean-time clock and a Fauth siderial clock, and is kept at an even temperature. For years the noon signals of the Washington clock have been recorded daily on the Creighton Observatory chronograph. There is a regulator, which operates an electric dial in the college, a chronometer, barometer, thermometer, astronomical theodolite, a double mirror heliostat, completely mounted 15-inch celestial and terrestrial globes, Bailey's astral lantern, and a number of minor instruments and attachments.

The institution is under the direction of William F. Rigge, the work of the observatory consisting of thorough instruction in both practical and theoretical astronomy.

Observatory of the Iowa University, Iowa City, Iowa, L. G. Weld, director.—A student's astronomical observatory has recently been established at the State University of Iowa, Iowa City, under the direction of Prof. L. G. Weld. The main building is 12 feet square, capped by a cylindrical turret, in which is mounted a Grubb equatorial of 5 inches aperture and 77½ inches focal length. A Wurdemann transit of 1¾ inches aperture and 24 inches focus is mounted in a wing 10 by 12 feet. Subsidiary apparatus consists of a 4-inch portable Fitz equatorial, clock, chronometer, and chronograph. (Smithsonian Report, 1892, page 730.)

Georgetown University, District of Columbia, John G. Hagen, director.—Observations of variable stars have been made systematically, and experiments in photographic observations of star transits, by Father Hagen and his assistant, Father Fargis. (Smithsonian Report, 1890, page 162.)

The instrument has an aperture of 4.8 inches.

Williams College Observatory, Williamstown, Mass., Truman Henry Safford, director.—The astronomical department of Williams College possesses two observatories for illustration and scientific investigation. The older was built by Prof. Albert Hopkins, in 1838, and contains an equatorial, by Phelps, of Troy, N. Y., with an object glass, by Alvan Clark, sr., which has an aperture of 7 inches. This instrument was constructed about 1852, and is interesting as an early example of Clark's optical work. It is employed for instruction and the observation of occasional phenomena. The other rooms of the Hopkins Observatory contain meteorological apparatus and a transit instrument, now little used, by Troughton & Simms, with an aperture of 3¾ inches. This part of the equipment is in no condition for use now. It is largely of historical value.

In another part of the town a plot, comprising 5¼ acres, was purchased in 1881 for astronomical purposes. At present this inclosure contains the field observatory, an iron meridian house, built at the expense of Hon. David Dudley Field, together with a hut for the accommodation of portable instruments. The main instrument of this observatory is a fine meridian circle by A. Repsold & Sons, of Hamburg, with a telescope of $4\frac{8}{10}$ inches aperture and a circle divided to 2′ of arc, reading by four microscopes to single seconds directly. The meridian circle is provided with the necessary clock, a fillet chronograph, and collimators according to Rittenhouse. In addition, the department of astronomy is provided with a sufficient number of portable instruments, among which are two telescopes for the simpler observations, a portable transit which can be used for a zenith telescope, and two theodolites, one of them a Wanschaff universal with 7-inch limb, latitude level, and microscopes reading to 5″ directly. There are also several instruments of reflection, including sextants, a prismatic circle, sailors' octants, with chronometers and artificial horizons, and other small pieces of apparatus. The meteorological apparatus has been kept in regular use since about 1816.

The astronomical work is in charge of Prof. Truman Henry Safford, who is assisted by Professor Mifham.

AMPLE INSTRUMENTS AND FACILITIES—THE NEED OF A BETTER SYSTEM.

From the above long lists yet concise descriptions of the observatories of America it will be easily understood that here is an enormous wealth of preparation for astronomical observation, discovery, and discussion. Ample physical means are at hand, while learned, industrious, and devoted observers are ready to use these means to their utmost for the development of the marvelous science of astronomy. Therefore, it can not be doubted that it is of the highest importance that all the astronomers in charge of these munificently endowed observatories in this country should work in complete harmony; and, moreover, that the national Observatory, which is particularly the property of all these astronomers, should be conducted on a plan properly correlated to the work which is carried on at the other observatories throughout this vast national domain of astronomical inquiry, and should, if possible, be made the model observatory in the United States.

THE BROAD SCOPE OF MODERN ASTRONOMICAL WORK.

It should be borne in mind that the scope of the work of modern astronomers is vastly broader than that of the earlier centuries. To practical and mechanical astronomy, concerning itself first with the movements of the sun and moon, the planets, satellites, comets, and meteors of our solar system, and next with the movements of the stars and the nebulæ, has been added inquiry into the facts revealed by astrophysical science, through the investigation of the physical properties of the heavenly bodies, made possible in years comparatively recent by the invention of the spectroscope and its application between 1817 and 1860 to astronomical research, and the increasing achievements of photography. Daguerreotypes began in 1839; photography applied in astronomy, eighteen years later.

With the field of astronomical work thus indefinitely extended, unquestionably the great need of the present day, at least in this country, is not more telescopes and more observatories, but a better organization of our astronomers, a better adjustment of the work of all to the work of each and of the work of each to the work of all, and more systematic and continuous labors on the part of the whole force engaged in utilizing the magnificent astronomical endowments which have been provided for them. To this end Congress can make a most important contribution by enacting the legislation now recommended by the board of visitors and the Secretary of the Navy.

STAR CATALOGUES.

Without entering upon a field the extent and the revelations of which I am unable even feebly to comprehend, the field where astrophysical science is undertaking, at vast expense and with arduous and incessant labor, to ascertain the physical properties of the worlds beyond ours to find out for men before they leave this world "what the stars are made of," I may be permitted to call the attention of Congress to the work yet to be done in order to even catalogue the stars which are now visible and can be photographed by instruments now in use. How many stars are there in the skies? Prof. C. A. Young says:

The total number that can be seen well enough for observation with such instruments as were used before the invention of the telescope is not quite 1,100. With even a small telescope the number is enormously increased. A mere opera glass an inch and a half in diameter brings out at least 100,000. The telescope with which Argelander made his Durchmusterung of more than 300,000 stars—all north of the celestial equator—had a diameter of only two inches and a half. The number visible in the great Lick telescope of 3 feet diameter is probably nearly 100,000,000.

The Durchmusterung of Argelander (Bonn Beob. III, IV, and V) contains 324,189 stars north of declination —2°. This number is incorrectly given by Argelander as 324,198. (See Harvard Annals, Volume XIV, page 478.) Argelander's successor, Schönfeld, extended this work to the southern stars from declination —2° to —23° (Bonn Beob. VIII). His catalogue contains 133,659 stars. Thome, at Cordoba, is now extending this work to the South Pole. He has published (Resultados del Observatorio Nacional Argentino, Volumes XVI and XVII) positions of 340,380 stars from declination —22° to —42°.

Consider how many stars yet remain to be photographed and catalogued which are rendered visible by the photographic telescope now in use.

One of the plates taken at Cambridge, Mass., with the Bruce photographic telescope, shows about 400,000 stars, or, excluding those near the edges, it shows about 250,000 in a region 5° square. One thousand six hundred plates would cover the entire sky, and, at this rate, would contain 400,000,000 stars. As, however, the stars are much less numerous in other parts of the sky, the actual number within our present reach possibly does not exceed 100,000,000. How many millions are there beyond the present reach of our existing telescopes and the appliances of photography?

In 1886 a conference of astronomers was held in Paris, which led to the attempt to obtain photographs of the entire sky. Seventeen observatories agreed to take part in this work, each having a particular portion of the sky assigned to it. Photographic telescopes of the usual form and having an aperture of 13 inches were prescribed for this work, each photograph covering a region only 2° square. Only a small portion of these photographs has so far been taken. The Harvard Observatory did not take part in this work, as the director had advised the conference that the whole work could be better done with 1 telescope than with 17 if a photographic doublet having an aperture of 24 inches was employed.

In 1892 Miss C. W. Bruce, of New York, gave the Harvard Observatory $50,000 to construct such an instrument, and it is now in regular use every clear night at the Arequipa Station. Regions 5° square are photographed on each plate. Prof. Herbert H. Turner, of Oxford, England, who at first opposed the use of the doublet, has recently published measures he has made of the Harvard photographs, from which he concludes that the dangers he had apprehended from distortion were unfounded. The entire sky could easily be photographed with this instrument every two or three years, but not to interfere with the work of the Paris conference, the instrument is used mainly for other purposes, such as charts having long exposures and photographs of spectra.

The northern sky is photographed several times every year at Cambridge, and the southern sky at Arequipa with two similar 8-inch doublets. The entire collection of Harvard photographs therefore includes, on the average, a hundred photographs of each portion of the sky on a hundred different nights. The Draper photographs, taken with the 8-inch telescope only, now number 23,704.

As an illustration of the use of this collection, a letter was received not long ago at Cambridge from the director of the Royal Observatory at the Cape of Good Hope, asking that search be made for a star recently observed there and which he thought might be new. In a few minutes the Harvard observers were able to see that the star was in the sky on June 13, 1889, and in a few days sent to him an account of all changes in its light which had happened during the preceeding ten years.

On another occasion search was made in the Draper photographs for the planet Eros during its opposition of 1894. It comes nearer to the earth than any other known celestial body except the moon, and approaches very closely every thirty-seven years, the last close approach being in 1893. Eros, however, was not discovered until 1898, and then Dr. S. C. Chandler made a laborious computation which indicated what its position was in 1893, and after along search among the photographs it was found, and appears, in all, upon 26 plates—15 charts and 5 spectrum plates between October, 1893, and May, 1894, and upon 6 chart plates in 1896—so that its position was accurately determined from these Draper photographs.

If Mr. Chandler finishes his calculations, they should give a better value of the distance of the sun and of the mass of the earth than that derived from the transit of Venus, in observing which the United States spent more than a million of dollars.

I hand to the President pro tempore, who is sitting near me, the photograph showing the course of Eros during its opposition of 1894, as discovered from those photographs, when the planet itself was not discovered until 1898.

After May 20, 1898, when Madame Ceraski, of the Moscow Observatory, discovered a variable star of the Algol type—that is, one having its light diminished at regular intervals by a dark companion revolving around it—observations were continued at Moscow for nearly a year and only one eclipse noticed. After June 1, 1899, when the discovery of the star was made known at Cambridge, there were found in one week in the Draper collection 200 photographs taken between 1890 and 1899 showing the star faint on twenty nights; and its period was determined with an uncertainty of about one second! The stellar timepiece is still running without rewinding and the predicted observations are being regularly fulfilled. No telescope is powerful enough to show the planet which causes this alternating brightness and faintness of this new Algol variable in Cygnus. More recently a second Algol variable has been discovered by Madame Ceraski; and it is found on the Draper photographs as far back as 1890, and its variations in magnitude for nine years have been computed at Cambridge.

A plan for securing cooperation in the use of the largest telescopes of this country is progressing favorably, and within a month the Yerkes 40-inch, the Lick 36-inch, the University of Virginia 26-inch, and the Harvard 15-inch telescopes will for the first time work together and will undertake to measure the brightness of very faint stars, visible only in such telescopes—a problem never before attempted.

I have a photograph of the Southern Cross from Harvard Observatory and a photograph of the Milky Way in Sagittarius, also from Harvard Observatory, which I hand to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and also a duplicate photograph of the Milky Way in the region of Cygnus, sent me by Prof. W. W. Payne and Asst. Prof. Herbert C. Wilson, of the observatory at Northfield, Minn. I hand this to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and ask him not to make another speech in the Senate until he has counted those stars upon the plate. [Laughter.]

THE BLESSINGS, MATERIAL, INTELLECTUAL, AND RELIGIOUS, OF ASTRONOMICAL DISCOVERIES.

In view of all these continuous and meritorious achievements of American astronomers let no economical doubter say that Congress has no right to expend the public money in the promotion of astronomical discovery because, as he may assert, it has ceased to do new and also practical good to mankind. It never can be predicted of any scientific inquiries that they will not result in practical good. At any moment a new discovery in science may be the means of prolonging human life, of adding to human comfort, and of increasing human wealth, to an extent compared with which the cost of the scientific inquiry will be insignificant.

I regret to see that Professor Young, in his introduction to his General Astronomy, gives countenance to the idea that further astronomical research is not likely to be of great practical good to mankind. While claiming that astronomy is far from a useless science because the art of navigation depends upon astronomical prediction, yet he says:

At present the end and object of astronomical study is chiefly knowledge, pure and simple; so far as now appears, its development has less direct bearing upon the material interests of mankind than that of any other of the natural sciences. It is not likely that great inventions and new arts will grow out of its laws and principles, such as are continually arising from physical, chemical, and biological discoveries, though of course it would be rash to say that such outgrowths are impossible. But the student of astronomy must expect his chief profit to be intellectual, in the widening of the range of thought and conception, in the pleasure attending the discovery of simple law working out the most complicated results, in the delight over the beauty and order revealed by the telescope in systems otherwise invisible, in the recognition of the essential unity of the material universe, and of the kinship between his own mind and the Infinite Reason that formed all things and is immanent in them.

This is the opinion of an eminent astronomer, yet it seems to me that a more just view of the subject would suggest that many additional outgrowths of practical inventions and new and useful arts may confidently be looked for, springing from new facts disclosed and new principles established by progressive astronomy. A science that can for years in advance predict the varying tides of the ocean and stay its waves upon the shore at fixed hours—one of the earliest and easiest of its marvelous accomplishments—must have other gifts for mankind, to benefit and make hopeful our daily life on earth.

But the broader view of astronomical science undoubtedly is the nobler one, and further astronomical research will be worth far more than its cost if its chief profit shall be only that claimed for it by Professor Young—that it strengthens the faith of man in the kinship between his own mind and the infinite reason that formed and is immanent in all things. The discoveries of astronomy constitute the most potent teachings of immortality, and can not but lead to the faith that the stars of heaven are our future and eternal homes. God's goodness, and not alone His omnipotence, is assured to us by the contemplation of the illimitable heavens. Charles Tennyson Turner most impressively expresses this idea in the three closing lines of his ode to the familiar constellation of Orion.

First the picture:

> How oft I've watched thee from the garden croft,
> In silence, when the busy day was done,
> Shining with wondrous brilliancy aloft,
> And flickering like a casement 'gainst the sun.
> I've seen thee soar from out some snowy cloud
> Which held the frozen breath of land and sea,
> Yet broke and severed as the wind grew loud.
> But earth-bound winds could not dismember thee,
> Nor shake thy frame of jewels.

Next the wonder:

> I have guessed
> At thy strange shape and function; haply felt
> The charm of that old myth about thy belt
> And sword.

And last the joyous faith and inspiring hope:

> But most my spirit was possessed
> By His Great Presence, Who is never far
> From His Light-Bearers, whether Man or Star.

I move that my amendment be printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10538) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CUSHINGS ISLAND, MAINE.

Mr. LODGE. Yesterday morning certain papers transmitted by the Secretary of War relating to the purchase of land on Cushings Island, Portland Harbor, Maine, to be used to erect additional batteries and for buildings for the troops thereon, were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that the papers may be recalled and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which has the fortification appropriation bill in charge; and I would also ask that it be done this evening, as the committee will sit to-morrow on this same matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Massachusetts will be complied with.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 12, 1900, at 12 o'clock m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 11, 1900.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL.

John B. Robinson, of Pennsylvania, to be marshal of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, vice James B. Reilly, whose term expired April 3, 1900.

POSTMASTERS.

Henry C. Budge to be postmaster ati Miami, in the county of Dade and State of Florida, in the place of J. S. Warner, resigned.

Charles P. Barnes to be postmaster at Brighton, in the county of Monroe and State of New York, in the place of C. J. Chism, whose commission expires April 16, 1900.

Robert J. Buck, to be postmaster at Watertown, in the county of Jefferson and State of New York, in the place of D. C. Middleton, resigned.

Frank S. Kenyon, to be postmaster at Adams, in the county of Jefferson and State of New York, in the place of E. C. Bersie, whose commission expired January 30, 1900.

SUPERVISOR OF CENSUS.

Mr. Daniel W. Patrick, of Gold Hill, N. C., to be a supervisor of the Twelfth Census for the Second supervisor's district of North Carolina, vice Augustus M. Moore, resigned.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Artillery arm.

First Lieut. Isaac N. Lewis, Seventh Artillery, to be captain, April 5, 1900, vice Sage, Sixth Artillery, retired from active service.

Second Lieut. Sam F. Bottoms, Sixth Artillery, to be first lieutenant, April 5, 1900, vice Lewis, Seventh Artillery, promoted.

Infantry arm.

Second Lieut. William K. McCue, First Infantry, to be first lieutenant, March 4, 1900, vice Koehler, Ninth Infantry, killed in action.

SECOND LIEUTENANT IN THE MARINE CORPS.

John P. V. Gridley, a citizen of Pennsylvania, to be a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps, from the 26th day of March, 1900, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade.

WITHDRAWAL.

Executive nomination withdrawn April 11, 1900.

F. A. Root, to be postmaster at Miami, in the State of Florida.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate April 11, 1900.

CONSUL.

James A. Mulkey, of Alabama, to be consul of the United States at Tuxpan, Mexico.

SUPERVISOR OF TWELFTH CENSUS.

Daniel W. Patrick, of Gold Hill, N. C., to be supervisor of the Twelfth Census for the Second district of North Carolina.

POSTMASTER.

Henry C. Budge, to be postmaster at Miami, in the county of Dade and State of Florida.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 11, 1900.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PORTO RICO.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DALZELL, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Rules, having had under consideration the resolution of the House No. 217, respectfully report the following substitute therefor:

"Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall be discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes," and the Senate amendments thereto; that the same shall be considered in the House until the hour of 5 o'clock p. m. on Wednesday, April 11, 1900, when, without delay or other motion, a vote shall be taken on the motion to concur in the said Senate amendments in gross; and all members shall have leave to print on the subject of said bill and amendments for ten days from the adoption of this rule."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and the previous question was ordered.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not occupy the time of the House at this time to do more than to explain this rule. On the 28th day of February the House sent to the Senate a bill entitled "An act to temporarily provide revenues for the relief of Porto Rico and other purposes." That bill was reported on the 1st day of March to the Senate, with certain amendments, and came back to the House on the 4th day of April, with sundry amendments, constituting a form for a civil government. The purpose of this rule is to afford until 5 o'clock to-day for discussion of the Senate amendment, and then to secure a vote upon a concurrence in the Senate amendments in gross. It is the opinion of the majority of this House that there has been sufficient discussion of this subject to cover all its details and that what the public interests and the people of the country now want is not discussion, but action. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. The rule, if it be adopted, provides in its phraseology that at 5 o'clock, without delay or other motion, a vote shall be had. I would like to ask the gentleman if that does not prevent any motion like a motion to recommit?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Or to alter or amend?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Then the object of the rule is to prevent a motion to recommit or amend?

Mr. DALZELL. The object of the rule is to secure a vote upon concurrence in the Senate amendments.

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Is it not a denial to the House of an opportunity to amend or change the bill in any respect?

Mr. DALZELL. I have answered the gentleman already.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, the previous question having been ordered on this rule, I suppose there will be forty minutes' debate—twenty minutes on this side and twenty minutes on the other side. Of course in the twenty minutes allowed for debate upon this proposition it is hardly time sufficient to comment upon the effect of the rule, and one can do but little more than enter upon a formal discussion of the iniquitous bill which is presented to us for our vote to-day. The rule provides that after the adoption of this resolution there shall be debate upon the bill until 5 o'clock, at which time a vote shall be taken upon one single separate motion, and that is to concur in gross in the numerous amendments which the Senate has presented to the bill which passed the House in February.

That bill, as will be remembered, provided in terms for a tariff on goods coming from Porto Rico and on goods going from the United States into Porto Rico at 15 per cent of present law. I shall not undertake to explain its objects and purpose now, for it is only a short time since it was considered by the House. The Senate saw fit, in the consideration of that bill, to make 19 amendments to its text, and added to it a bill providing a civil government, so called, for the Territory of Porto Rico.

Mr. Speaker, if it were possible to have the Senate add to the iniquity of the measure which passed the House, they have added that iniquity by a bill, imperialistic in its form, for a so-called civil government in Porto Rico. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I assert here and now that it was never the intention of the Republican party in the beginning to enact any such measure in reference to Porto Rico. I shall digress for a moment to undertake to prove this allegation, and then I want to ask the Republican party and the country why this sudden change has been made by the Republican party. That it was their intention to provide a measure giving free trade between the United States and Porto Rico I assume is beyond controversy or dispute. The President of the United States recommended that measure in his annual message to Congress; the Secretary of War, acting officially at the same time, made the same recommendation in effect to Congress. Not only so, but the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, as late as the middle of January, introduced a bill giving free trade to the people of Porto Rico with the people of the United States.

And, further, the very gentleman in the Senate—and I shall not comment upon what occurred there—but the gentleman who prepared and presented and sustained these Senate amendments to this bill introduced a measure into the Senate providing for free trade, in effect, between Porto Rico and the United States. Every commission, every public official, that has been sent by the President of the United States to Porto Rico has recommended free trade between that island and the United States.

I will not take the time to read them, but I shall insert the references that I have made in my remarks. Many of the leading Republican Senators of the United States have declared in favor of free trade between that Territory and the United States. Republicans of great ability outside of public life, not members of either one of the Houses of Congress, have declared the same way. I will not read them. I will refer briefly to recommendations made by the distinguished gentleman who occupied the chair which you now occupy, sir, one of the greatest Republicans that have ever lived in this country, ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed. Commenting on your bill for a 25 per cent tariff against Porto Rico, he said: "The attempt to make three-quarters citizens of the Porto Ricans is certainly original;" and further, if we can rely upon the statements of the public press, he has called your great Chief Magistrate an "Emperor of Expediency." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Not only so, but take the only living ex-President of your party in the United States, Benjamin Harrison, and he says: "I regard the bill as a most serious departure from right principles." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

General Davis has recommended free trade. There are others, but I will not have time to refer to them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have made reference to this simply to show that the entire Republican party, and the officials who have been sent to this island of Porto Rico, have recommended a policy which you started out to give to the people of that island, but for some reason upon which you suddenly changed your minds. Why did you change your minds? My friend from Ohio [Mr. LENTZ] now sitting near me asks me to ask you further, when you changed your minds, where you changed your minds, and who was present when the change was made?

Mr. Speaker, one other fact. I had hoped that the able Secretary of War would answer the reasonable request made by this House upon him on last Saturday to furnish this House with the opinions of his legal adviser upon this Territorial question. There is in the War Department a division known as the division of insular affairs. This division is presided over by Judge Charles E. Magoon, a lawyer chosen by the Secretary of War to advise the Department of War on insular affairs.

The facts are, Mr. Speaker—and I charge them here—that under the obligations resting upon this legal adviser the Secretary of War was told nearly a year ago that the Constitution of the United States ex proprio vigore applied to Porto Rico. I charge that Judge Magoon, after giving him that opinion, fortified it in writing. I charge that, being responsible, as he was, to the Secretary of War for this legal opinion, he solemnly gave it to him; that the Secretary prepared a proclamation, a proclamation for the President of the United States to sign, giving free trade to Porto Rico. The President not then being in the city, that proclamation was sent to him at his summer home for his signature, all going on the idea that free trade was to be proclaimed between the people of Porto Rico and the United States. This proclamation was made upon the advice and the opinion of Judge Magoon, the legal adviser of the War Department, upon this subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, last Saturday a resolution was passed by this House calling on the Secretary of War to furnish the opinion of Judge Magoon, upon which was to be based this proclamation of free trade with Porto Rico. A responsible journal in this country, not given to sensationalism, a responsible journal—the New York Herald—has printed a portion of Judge Magoon's opinion which we have sought in vain to obtain. Last Saturday the House requested—a reasonable request, too—of the Secretary of War to furnish this opinion, and on yesterday, the opinion not having been sent here, I sent my secretary to the Secretary of War with a communication asking him to answer the resolution of the House and send us the opinions of Judge Magoon in time for to-day's debate.

It is now 12 o'clock—half past 12—and no response comes from the Secretary of War. I think I am justified in reading what this respectable and reliable paper, the New York Herald, has published as a portion of the opinion of Judge Magoon. What is it, Mr. Speaker? Mark you, this opinion was given to the Secretary of War by an officer charged with the responsibility of advising him as to the law upon the question involved. I will do the Secretary of War the justice to say he informed me over the telephone this morning he was copying the opinion of Mr. Magoon and that the House would have it later to-day. If it comes during the day, I shall refer to it in the debate.

I will read an extract from the first opinion of Judge Magoon. Allow me to state that in February last, when the Republican party decided to make this radical change in their policy, Judge Magoon delivered another opinion—a pamphlet of 72 pages—in which he says that the Constitution does not ex proprio vigore extend to the island of Porto Rico. This was his declaration after having first delivered an opinion that the Constitution did so extend—if the journal I refer to can be depended upon. Let me read you a brief extract from the first opinion of Judge Magoon. After discussing the effects of the ratification of the treaty between Spain and the United States as to Porto Rico, he says:

By such ratification the island of Porto Rico became incorporated within the territorial limits of the United States. Being now a part and parcel of the United States, it is subject to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

What else did Judge Magoon say? I read again from his first opinion:

No further action by Congress is necessary or possible. Porto Rico being a portion of the United States, while it remains such Congress is as powerless to confer the Constitution upon it as it is to take the Constitution away from it.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

So far as the Constitution is involved, the rights of this Government in Porto Rico are established and secured.

There is more of it which I will not read, but will print with my remarks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this opinion is correct, what right have you to pass either of the provisions of this bill—either the House portion or the Senate amendments? Why did you change your minds? That question has been asked and answered by the newspapers of this country. What reason do you assign for the present change and reversal of your policy? I will not undertake to be offensive; but Mr. Schurman, president of one of your insular commissions, if the newspapers tell the truth, made the following statement:

The reason for this change is that the trusts went down to Washington and grappled the Republican party by the throat and made it change, and choked it to their advantage.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

I will publish all of this article in my remarks. The trusts, he says, took hold of your party by the throat and forced you to change your policy. Is that true? [Voices on the Republican side, "No!"] I will insert just here, without stopping to read them, extracts from a few newspapers on your policy. These are mainly Republican papers. I could use many more.

[From Chicago Inter-Ocean, March 9, 1900.]

THE LOBBY CRACKS THE WHIP.

What caused Congress and the Administration to face about on the Porto Rico tariff bill? Numerous excuses for this lightning change have been put forth, but each has been abandoned almost as soon as offered.

Not one of them has had any influence with the people. Not one has been an adequate explanation. Not one has borne the stamp of sincerity. Not one has told the truth, namely, that it was the lobby.

In June last W. W. Mount declared in a high-tariff magazine that the American sugar growers looked with disfavor on Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Philippines. Mr. Mount assumed that the Administration policy toward these lands would be fatal to the sugar interests of this country. To prevent free trade in sugar with our island possessions, he said, "sugar producers all over the United States, with a vast contingent of foundrymen, railroad systems, commission men, and banks, whose capital floats as it were largely in molasses, had prepared to make a strong fight in Congress for the protection of this industry."

The pertinence of these remarks to the act of infamy perpetrated in Washington on February 28 is pointed by the fact that the head of the lobby which went to Washington to fight against the people's policy of free trade with Porto Rico was Henry Oxnard, the admitted champion of the sugar interests in the United States, as well as the confessed antagonist of the expansion policy brought about by our war with Spain. Mr. Oxnard's activity in securing the 15 per cent tariff from the Ways and Means Committee has been published repeatedly in the correspondence of every newspaper man who sends intelligence from Washington to this city.

The support which he received from the tobacco interests of the East is also a notorious fact. Hence, despite excuses and pretexts put forth by the men who support the Porto Rico monstrosity, the public is forced to the conclusion that the majority of the Republicans in the House of Representatives were compelled to repudiate their own convictions and to violate the convictions of the American people under the pressure exerted by the sugar interests, according to Mr. Mount's plan, and reenforced by the tobacco men of the East.

Without doubt this was a powerful organization. It certainly was powerful enough to bend the authorities in Washington to its ends. Nevertheless we believe its power will prove as nothing against the convictions and purposes of the American people.

For ten years before the declaration of war in 1898 it was known that Cuba and Porto Rico were ground down to poverty under Spanish policy. The principle of the Spanish tariff in Cuba and Porto Rico was to make trade between the West India islands and the United States as difficult as possible. Manufactured products from Spain went into the islands at a low rate of duty. Manufactured products from the United States went in at an exorbitantly high rate. Under this system Porto Rican trade was so limited as to prevent any progress in the island. When the island was annexed to the United States the people of Porto Rico expected and were promised prosperous conditions.

The President recommended a policy to produce such conditions. Congress at first approved it, but now, under the influence of the sugar and tobacco interests, another policy has been adopted, the people have been defied, and dissensions have been created which threaten the success of the Republican party.

The interests of the country and the party are dearer to the people of the West than are stockholders' profits on sugar and tobacco. The welfare of the country, the principle of the expansion policy, the instincts of patriotism are too strong to be overcome by even such a lobby as is now cracking the whip over the Republican leaders at Washington.

[From Philadelphia North American, March 15, 1900.]

JUSTICE FOR PORTO RICO.

Senator FORAKER's bill giving Porto Rico civil government and admitting goods from the United States free of duty, while imposing a duty of 15 per cent of the Dingley tariff on her exports to the United States, is reported to have met with the approval of the Republican caucus. It is also said that the House will agree to it.

The bill is a mistake. Nothing short of free trade with Porto Rico will do. As the President has said, it is our plain duty to grant that.

Porto Rico has been brought under the American flag. Her people are entitled to the status of American citizens. There is no good reason why the island should not be treated as a Territory, precisely as Arizona and New Mexico are. Soon or late we shall have to come to this, and why not now?

Public opinion throughout the United States—Republican as well as Democratic opinion—is strongly opposed to any discrimination against Porto Rico.

Justice must be done, or the party which refuses it will be held to account.

[From Boston Advertiser, February 28, 1900.]

SCHURMAN AWAKES.

President Schurman, of the first Philippine Commission, makes the statement that if the Porto Rico tariff is adopted it may be truly said that "the trusts went down to Washington and grappled the Republican party by the throat and made it choke to their advantage." The chances are that if President Schurman had remained at Washington he would not have made that remark. Being outside of the "sphere of influence," he is coming again to see straight and to talk straight, as he did once before.

The trouble with many members of Congress, with reference to the Porto Rico tariff, is that they do not really understand how thoroughly the American people are aroused in this matter. If Congress could get in touch with the prevailing public sentiment, the Porto Rico tariff bill would be dropped like a red-hot horseshoe. Every official adviser of the President has declared against it. The President is solemnly on record against it. Public sentiment is sweepingly against it. Why in the world, then, should Congress be in such a terrific hurry to make a blunder?

[Boston Traveller, March 14, 1900.]

PORTO RICO.

The shilly-shally vacillation of the President over the question of the tariff of Porto Rico has proven to be one of the most disastrous faux pas of his blunder Administration. The Republican party is all at sea over the proposed bill imposing a tariff of 15 per cent, and the "whippers in" have thus far failed utterly in their efforts to restore party harmony.

The projected overriding of the Constitution has excited a storm of disapproval all over the country, and public sentiment has had its effect upon the members of Congress. Meanwhile the President continues to flounder and to attempt to excuse his course and amend his previously expressed ideas, with the result that no one appears to know what to expect or what to do. The leading citizens of Porto Rico are aroused in antagonism to the 15 per cent tariff bill with its rider to present the $2,000,000 already collected in taxes to the islands.

Altogether it is a very malodorous kettle of fish that is simmering for the Republican party in the Porto Rican affair.

[New York Mail and Express, March 26, 1900.]

NO TEMPORARY SETTLEMENT.

The proposition to tariff Porto Rican products has met the inevitable fate of all measures that menace the honor and fair-mindedness of the American people. Its advocates will not even put it to the test of an open roll call in the House. They realize that they were never so weak in votes or in public opinion as now, after a full debate of the subject. Hence they are on the retreat, and the only question with them is where they can conveniently halt. Our Washington dispatches state that many propositions for a compromise have been offered by the revenue-tariff advocates, but so far with no success. The "insurgents" stand out firmly for the full measure of justice to Porto Rico.

Chairman PAYNE will put himself in line with his country if he will make no halt in his backward travels until he reaches the point at which he originally stood. He is the author of a bill giving Porto Rico unrestricted access to our ports. He has not yet made public any adequate reason for abandoning that measure. Indeed, he has given no reason at all. His line of retreat, therefore, to the unassailable position he once occupied is entirely open. Our advice to him is to make a short cut for it, abandon all temporizing propositions, and meet the main question squarely, courageously, and honorably.

Mr. PAYNE must realize now, if he never did before, that that is not only what the country wants, but what it will have. There can be no permanent settlement of the question short of free and unrestricted trade with the island we have taken under our flag.

Mr. Speaker, a gentleman of this city, a reputable local writer on one of our papers here, the Evening Star, said that a Representative on your side, a Republican, told him that this bill would pass because a large contribution had been promised by the trusts of this country to your campaign fund. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, you do not investigate that matter. The name of the writer of that statement is known. I guess it is well known to gentlemen on the other side who wrote that article; he is well known in the city of Washington; it is well known on this side of the House who wrote it, and I presume gentlemen on the other side know it. And you dare not, by an investigation, attempt to disprove the statement that some Republican member of the House told the gentleman that the money had been paid, that the price had been put up, and that this bill would pass, because you dared not defeat it.

That is the statement in substance. The name of the writer is John P. Miller. There is no secret about it. He is a local writer on the Star. Now, I do not know how this is, but I believe that some Republican told Mr. Miller that the money had been paid—the consideration given—and that the bill would pass.

Mr. RAY of New York and Mr. BABCOCK rose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You gentlemen will have plenty of time; I can not give away my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield. When a gentleman declines to yield there is no use trying to force a question upon him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My time is very limited, and I can not yield.

I make no charge; I simply tell you that these things are published; they have appeared in the newspapers. The gentleman who makes these statements is responsible; he is reliable; he is, in my judgment, a truthful man. Mr. Speaker, of course if the price has been paid, you gentlemen will come forward and put this bill through.

What other excuse is given for your change? The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has recently said that if you should take away the tariff levied by this bill the trusts that have control of the sugar and tobacco interests would be made a present, I believe, of something like $250,000 or $300,000. He says, in effect, we must not let these trusts get the bonus of $250,000 or more, which they would get if free trade was given Porto Rico. Then let me ask, why do you cut off 85 per cent of the present tariff law and give these bad trusts the benefit of this bonus?

If the small tariff of 15 per cent in this bill gives them a bonus of $250,000, then the 85 per cent reduction from the Dingley Act, which you make in this bill, gives them nearly six times 15 per cent—that is, 85 per cent. If 15 per cent equals a bonus of $250,000 to the bad trusts, then 85 per cent equals about six times as much, or nearly $1,500,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You strain at giving them $250,000, but you give them $1,500,000 by a reduction of the tariff without a murmur of complaint.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish I had more time. I dislike very much to have used nearly all of our twenty minutes. I had intended to use only one-half of it and yield the remainder to gentlemen on this side.

I reserve the remainder of the time alloted to this side of the House under the rule. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman from Tennessee remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has one minute and a half remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. I trust the gentleman will occupy that time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If there is to be but one speech, Mr. Speaker, on the other side, of course I will use the time now. Otherwise the custom is to divide the time. If there is to be but one address on that side, of course I will use the time to which I am entitled now.

Mr. DALZELL. Of course we have the right to conclude debate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Undoubtedly; but in the event that you have more than one speaker to occupy the time on that side, I think I have the right to reserve the time under the practice of the House.

Mr. DALZELL. We will probably have more than one speaker on this side.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under the practice it is customary to alternate between the sides.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that there is no rule providing what the gentleman contends for.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But, Mr. Speaker, I say the practice has been to alternate in discussing a question of this kind between the two sides.

The SPEAKER. That is on general questions, not on a matter of adopting a rule with twenty minutes' debate on a side unless there has been some agreement entered upon.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, the presentation of this rule is good evidence that those who have been trying to suppress the intellect, chain the will, and eradicate the conscience of the other side have concluded that their work is performed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A bill which ought to go, in the very nature of things, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and be subject to debate in that committee is not to go there and is not to be subject to debate. Those who are timid enough to be driven, against their judgment and consciences, to support the outrage of this rule, and the greater or the twin outrage of the measure itself, must recognize the fact that the Republicans who stand on the mountain tops challenge the admiration of the country—the few who are independent and manly enough to vote their judgment and their conscience stand there—while the pigmies and cowards are cowering in the underbrush and hiding in the fens and thickets far below. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You may suppress the conscience, the judgment, and the rights of members here, but I submit, in the very brief time in which I have to submit anything, that you make a grievous mistake in supposing that you may suppress conscience, judgment, or independence in the rank and file of your party, on which you must depend not far hence.

I appeal to the country from this subdued House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK].

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has seen fit to give publicity to a charge that the action of the Republican party on the Porto Rican bill has been influenced by a money consideration from the trusts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire, as a member of the Congressional committee, to deny that and to say that the statement is simply rot, and to challenge the gentleman from Tennessee or any other Democrat to name the Republican that ever made any statement of that kind. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentleman——

Mr. BABCOCK. Not only that, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at all.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. He is afraid to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. We will prove it if we get a chance.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say this, that the shoe is on the other foot, that the great sugar trust and the American Tobacco Company are the ones who started the agitation against this bill [derisive laughter on the Democratic side and applause on the Republican side], to bring their sugar and tobacco in here without paying any duty, and it is simply ridiculous to charge that any corporation would contribute money for a protective tariff.

Mr. HENRY of Mississippi. It is charged by your own papers.

Mr. BABCOCK. And I desire again to repeat the challenge that I have made, for any Democrat, or anyone else, to name the Republican who has made any such statement as the gentleman from Tennessee charges.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Miller says he will do it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fifteen minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield seven minutes and a half to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, it is a glorious thing to me to witness the intense anxiety of the Democratic party on this floor and of the mugwump press of this country, and a few other gentlemen, that the Republican party shall not destroy itself. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I have been a member of this House for a good many years, and have passed through the great excitements of the various tariff bills, war measures, and all the great issues that for sixteen years have presented themselves here, and yet I never saw the Democratic party so zealous, so sorrowfully zealous, that the Republican party shall do itself no harm. [Laughter on the Republican side.] It has ransacked every telegraph office in the United States to bring its members here, to vote for what? To keep the Republicans from bringing upon themselves the odium and curse of an outraged public sentiment. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Independent newspapers, independent of everything but one thing, just pluming their wings to light in the Bryan camp, appeal to the Republican members of this House, "For God's sake, do not do yourselves any hurt." [Laughter.] What is the necessity of it? Why this anxiety? It gives the brand of hypocrisy to the whole outfit. The Republican majority on this floor stands in favor of the principles of its party. The question that is to be submitted in a few moments is a question of party policy that has been made a political and party question by the action of the Democratic caucus. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is right. I am glad to hear the cheers come from Mississippi. It invited into its councils the whole Democratic multitude and made it an issue of Democracy, a pure and simple issue: "Vote against this bill or go outside of the Democratic party." That was the issue presented in the caucus here last Saturday.

Mr. TERRY. What about "plain duty?" [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I honor the party for its action. I honor the party that sees politics in a thing of this character, and I honor the men of the Democratic side who voted for this bill originally, who put their allegiance to party up against the question of consistency. That is the kind of a man that this country admires and will always forgive even if he makes a mistake.

Mr. NEVILLE. How about the Republicans? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The House must not be turned into a place of demonstration.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Democratic party has made this a question of party fealty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will protect both sides of this Chamber, but must have the assistance of gentlemen on this floor. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not need any protection. [Laughter.] I am a protectionist myself. [Renewed laughter.] The Republican party made it an issue and called together the council of the party. After weeks and months of study and discussion we said that the members of the party on this floor should get together and let us see the best thing to do. We came together, differing in opinion as to some details, and then said, in light of the fact that the President of the United States, all his Cabinet, and nine-tenths of the Republican members of this House, and more than that of the Senate, are in favor of the passage of this bill, we said we would pass it, and it was made the shibboleth of Republicanism. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

I hurl in the teeth of the gentleman from Tennessee his statement that bribery is here. Does he think that he can be a hypocrite everywhere and not be exposed? Does he think that there is not some place where somebody will lift the curtain that he hides behind? If he believes, as he says he believes, and I say he does not believe, that any member on this side of the House made that statement—that there had been money put up to carry this measure—if he believes it, why did he not investigate it? "Why do not we?" says he. We do not believe it. We believe that it is a lie, and we know it is a lie at one place or other on the line. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It may be that Mr. Miller heard some member say it. I do not say that that is not true. If some member did say it, he is a liar. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] We have nothing concealed. Let the gentleman from Tennessee, who brings in such an insinuation, introduce a resolution to-day to investigate this question, and he will have consent given to it in less than fifteen minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GROSVENOR. If it is a question; yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I was simply going to say that I did not say there was anything in the charge.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; that is the same slimy, slippery statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman did not hear my question. The question I wished to ask is if you did not have a resolution for that purpose?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did; and I investigated it, and it was not introduced.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I supposed that would be introduced.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I found that there was not a word of truth in it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I mean in the story itself. I will give the gentleman the resolution, if he wants to introduce it, and say we will investigate it. But the gentleman can not make a straightforward statement about anything. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Missouri characterized this rule as an outrage. I would like to recall to mind the spectacle that I witnessed and that many of you witnessed in this House not many years ago. The leader of the then Democratic majority in closing his debate upon the Wilson bill summoned all gentlemen upon that side of the House to make haste to get upon the "roll of honor." That bill went to the Senate, and was so changed in every essential feature that no Democrat in this House could recognize it as the bill which originated here. In a spirit of indignation, after a general proclamation day after day, week after week, while that bill was in conference, that it never could be passed, never assented to by the Democrats of the House, the President sent to a member of this body a letter addressed to "My dear CATCHINGS," in which he denounced the Senate bill as a measure "of perfidy and dishonor."

Your then great leader, Mr. Wilson, proclaimed that the session should die rather than that any Democrat at this end of the Capitol should ratify a measure of "perfidy and dishonor." Yet, on the 13th day of August, 1894, "My dear CATCHINGS" introduced into this House (and the Democratic majority passed) a rule that rescinded their agreement to a conference, that discharged their conferees, that concurred in 644 amendments in gross upon an hour's debate on either side; and then they tumbled over each other to get onto the roll of dishonor, and yet we hear to-day from the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Missouri that this is "an outrage!" O, ye Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] You prate here about change of view.

No change of view was ever possible when this question was presented. When this question was presented for consideration the Democratic party and the Republican party naturally found each its respective platform in accordance with their respective histories. True to yourselves, you went for your law to the infamous Dred Scott decision and for your politics to John C. Calhoun. [Applause on the Republican side.] We on this side of the House went for our law to John Marshall and Daniel Webster, and for our politics to the Republican platform in 1856 and to the platform on which Abraham Lincoln was elected President of the United States. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The Republican platform of 1856 declared:

Resolved, That the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government, and that in the exercise of this power it is both the right and the duty of Congress to prohibit in the Territories those twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery.

The Republican platform of 1860 declared—

That the new dogma that the Constitution, of its own force, carries slavery into any or all of the Territories of the United States is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with the explicit provisions of that instrument itself, with contemporaneous exposition, and with legislative and judicial precedent; is revolutionary in its tendency and subversive of the peace and harmony of the country.

Entertaining the views that you entertain, you could not do otherwise than be for free trade. Entertaining the views that we entertain, in view of all the conditions, we can not assume any other attitude than the attitude we did assume.

Now, gentlemen, in spite of the Democratic party, in spite of the Democratic press, in spite of a misguided Republican press [laughter on the Democratic side], the Republican majority, on whose shoulders rests the responsibility of this legislation, proposes to assume it, and I venture to say that the day is not far distant when the masses of the people of this country will say that this great measure was wise, beneficent, and in accordance with the duty resting upon the Republican party. [Great applause on the Republican side].

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to recommit the resolution with instructions. I have sent to the desk the motion which I desire to make.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the previous question has been ordered, and nothing is in order now but a vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A motion to recommit is in order.

Mr. DALZELL. I think not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that on the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee there has been a conflict of rulings. Some Speakers have held that the motion was in order, and others have held that the motion is not in order. Speaker Crisp has held that the motion was not in order. Speaker Reed has admitted it. The present Chair is clearly of the opinion that a rule reported by the Committee on Rules, upon which the previous question is ordered, is not subject to a motion to recommit, and therefore overrules the motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the Chair permit the motion to be read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated what it was; but the Clerk may report the motion.

Mr. DALZELL. I object, Mr. Speaker; let us have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Let the Clerk read the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the pending proposed rule be recommitted to the Committee on Rules with instructions to that committee to report a rule providing that it shall be in order to move in the House that the House concur in the Senate amendment to H. R. 8245 with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause of the bill and inserting in lieu thereof a measure providing:

First. For free trade between the United States and Porto Rico.

Second. A civil government for the territory of Porto Rico, republican in form.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that this is not in order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I shall not appeal, as I do not wish to consume the time allowed for debate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. A division, Mr. Speaker.

Several MEMBERS. Ayes and noes.

The SPEAKER. The ayes and noes are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 159, nays 142, answered "present" 12, not voting 38; as follows:

So the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules was adopted.

Before the result of the vote was announced, the following proceedings took place:

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on this question I voted "aye;" but I am paired with my colleague, Mr. THAYER. I wish to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

The name of Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts was again called, and he answered "present."

Mr. SLAYDEN. I wish to withdraw my vote, being paired with Mr. ESCH of Wisconsin, and to vote "present."

The name of Mr. SLAYDEN was again called, and he answered "present."

Mr. STEWART of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire how my colleague, Mr. MAY, voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the gentleman did not vote.

Mr. STEWART of New York. I wish, then, to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

The name of Mr. STEWART of New York was again called and he answered "present."

Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I voted in the negative, but I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. BARNEY. I wish to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

The name of Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi was again called, and he answered "present."

Mr. RIXEY. I voted on the first roll call, but I did not catch my name as the vote was recapitulated. I would like to know whether I am recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerks inform the Chair that they did not understand the gentleman to vote.

Mr. RIXEY. I desire to withdraw my vote, because I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. MINOR.

Mr. MCALEER. I am paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. STEWART. I voted in the negative, but I wish to withdraw my vote and be marked "present."

Mr. MCALEER'S name was again called, and he answered "present."

Mr. COWHERD. I am paired with the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. TAWNEY, who was expected to arrive here by this time, but he has not. I wish to withdraw my vote in the negative and be recorded "present."

The name of Mr. COWHERD was again called, and he answered "present."

Mr. TATE. Mr. Speaker, I was in the Hall of the House, but failed to hear my name called. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. TATE. I can not say whether I was listening at that particular time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is sorry, but upon the statements of the gentleman his request to vote can not be entertained.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Kansas, Mr. RIDGELY, desires me to state that he is detained at home by illness, and if present would vote "no."

The SPEAKER. Statements of that character are not in order.

The following pairs were announced:

For this session:

Mr. HULL with Mr. HAY.

Mr. PACKER of Pennsylvania with Mr. POLK.

Until further notice:

Mr. BARNEY with Mr. ALLEN of Mississippi.

Mr. WEYMOUTH with Mr. BROUSSARD.

Mr. ESCH with Mr. SLAYDEN.

Mr. TAWNEY with Mr. COWHERD.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts with Mr. THAYER.

Mr. HAWLEY with Mr. COOPER of Texas.

Mr. BURKETT with Mr. BURKE of Texas.

Mr. MAHON with Mr. OTEY.

Mr. MINOR with Mr. RIXEY.

Mr. LYBRAND with Mr. GASTON.

On this vote (Porto Rican bill):

Mr. DAHLE of Wisconsin with Mr. RIDGELY.

Mr. KERR with Mr. CARMACK.

Mr. DAVEY with Mr. CROWLEY.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana with Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana.

Until April 20:

Mr. OTJEN with Mr. BRENNER.

Until April 19:

Mr. STEWART of New York with Mr. MAY.

Until April 16:

Mr. WACHTER with Mr. SMALL.

Until April 11, inclusive:

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey with Mr. MCALEER.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 158; the nays 142; answering "present" 11. The ayes have it; and the resolution is adopted.

[Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time allotted for debate be divided equally between the two sides of the House, the time on the other side to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and on this side by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would give how much time, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. That would give one hour and forty-seven minutes to each side.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield forty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Speaker, as the emigrant, who, traveling across our Western plains, is unexpectedly overwhelmed by a wintry storm, and, driven by the blast, loses his way and wanders far from his path, and who takes advantage of the first opportunity afforded him to view his new surroundings and mark out his course for the morrow, so may we, in imitation of his wise example, after the fierce storm of public opinion has partially abated, examine closely our surroundings and take carefully our bearings, in order that, on surer ground and with swifter tread, we may fearlessly push forward in the future.

Mr. Speaker, from the beginning of this controversy down to the present time there has been so much of misapprehension and misrepresentation, so much of crimination and recrimination, so many charges and countercharges, both in this body and throughout the land, that I shall consider myself fortunate if in the brief time so courteously allotted me I shall be able to search out some of the hidden causes which have produced so great public agitation—an agitation, sir, which, in many of its aspects, wears features more startling and extraordinary than are usually met with in the annals of our legislative history. Search them out, Mr. Speaker, not to gratify an idle curiosity, but that, thus knowing these objections, we may happily be able to overcome them and, in overcoming them, win all the people to our cause; for, sir, such is the patriotic genius of American citizenship that, with it, prejudice always yields to logic and passion gives place to reason.

What, then, are the reasons for the hostility of the public mind toward this proposed legislation—a hostility isolated and yet violent, sporadic and yet determined?

REPUBLICAN LEADERS A UNIT.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I believe that one of the most potent influences which has led to such misapprehension on the part of the people was the supposed conflict existing between the Committee on Ways and Means of this House and the President of the United States.

As is so well known to the House and to the country, the President in his annual message to Congress recommended free trade between this country and Porto Rico. As is equally well known, the Ways and Means Committee brought forward a measure providing for a tariff of 25 per cent of the Dingley rates on all merchandise entering Porto Rico from this country and entering this country from Porto Rico. Forthwith the country was seized with the idea that there was a conflict between this body and the President, and the people rose en masse to sustain, as they believed, the Chief Executive.

But, Mr. Speaker, as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has so well said to-day, that illusion should be at once dispelled from the public mind, because it is now positively known of all men that the President of this Republic, the members of his official family, the leaders of the great Republican party here and elsewhere are to-day a unit in support of this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

CHANGE OF MIND FOUNDED ON REASON.

Sir, the second cause that has led to public agitation on this question is the charge of a change of mind on the part of the President of the United States and the Ways and Means Committee, and that it was due to some sinister influence, some dark and mysterious power that stood somewhere in the shadow; and it has been iterated and reiterated, not only on the floor of the House by the distinguished leader of the Democracy here, as we heard this morning in his address, but throughout the country, that such was the condition. But, Mr. Speaker, that charge is as absolutely unfounded and as wholly unwarranted as any ever made against the public servants of the people of this Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.]

What, then, was the cause of that change? Sir, when the President came to deal with Porto Rico in the preparation of his message, upon whom would he rely for information as to the affairs of that island? Manifestly upon its Governor-General. Manifestly upon the one man who was charged with its government and who was most familiar with its conditions. That capable and efficient officer, in his report to the President in September last, recommended substantial free trade between this country and Porto Rico. The President, doubtless relying upon that report, recommended free trade. The Secretary of War in his report voiced the same sentiment. The able chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, pursuing the same course, introduced a bill into this body in January providing for free trade between this country and that island. Was there anything remarkable in this succession of recommendations? Manifestly not.

But, sir, that report of Governor-General Davis was made within a month after the devastating hurricane, which left distress and disaster in its wake, had swept over the island, and before he fully realized the desolation of its people.

Subsequently, and after the President had sent his message to Congress, he made another report to the President of the United States, in which he said that when his first report was made he had not fully apprehended the disaster in that island, and had not fully comprehended its real situation. And, Mr. Speaker, while he had said that $2,000,000 would be sufficient to operate the insular government, he said that it would not be sufficient to relieve distress, to rehabilitate the island, to resuscitate its prostrate industries, and to bring hope where despair reigned.

He said that it would not be best that free trade should be at once established between these two countries, for not only was the government of the island to be operated, but some measure of immediate relief must be at once devised to meet the crying emergency of the hour. Now, sir, was not the President of this great Republic warranted in leaning upon that officer? Was not the Ways and Means Committee of this House authorized in standing by the President of the United States in any subsequent declaration that he made as well as his first one?

If the President's written words are to be regarded by Congress, are his spoken words to be less lightly considered?

Sir, much criticism of the President has been indulged in, even by patriotic people, because he did not see fit to send a subsequent message to Congress when such new information was obtained as warranted a modification of his original recommendation. Mr. Speaker, I am not authorized to speak for that great man, but I have no doubt that he would have done so had he remotely suspected, or had reason to do so, the indignation which pervaded the country because of the introduction of this measure.

The President is required by the Constitution to inform Congress from time to time of the condition of the country, and upon such information to recommend such legislation as in his judgment is deemed wisest and best for the people.

But, sir, if after his message has been delivered such new information is received and such additional facts are discovered as warrant a change in his recommendations, are his suggestions to this effect, even to individual members, to be frivolously cast aside and wholly ignored?

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party is a practical party. It answers questions as they are asked. It solves problems as they arise. It meets conditions as they occur, and when new information was obtained on this subject and new light was thrown upon it we rose to the height of the occasion and prepared to solve the problem that immediately confronted us. Why, sir, but a few days ago Governor-General Davis in a letter used this language, showing incontestably his position on this much-vexed question:

I have not felt it proper for me to discuss Congressional matters, filling, as I do, an executive position. I have expressed my views fully, however, on Porto Rico's needs, and I might say if Congress should adopt free trade the receipts of the custom-houses would naturally cease. One million five hundred thousand dollars has been collected during the fiscal year, and with free trade this will fall off. What, then, will run the island? Although I have received no official advices regarding an appropriation, I understand, through the newspapers, that an appropriation was decided upon, and I infer that this appropriation will be spent on insular government expenses. If free trade is adopted I can not see how the necessary funds for the conduct of the affairs of the island are to be raised by myself or those who succeed me. Two million dollars are the present expenses, and this amount will be needed annually. There is only a small revenue incoming from stamps, liquors, tobacco, and mercantile licenses, and it is impossible to collect taxes because of the conditions.

What, then, will run the island?

Mr. Speaker, that was the question that confronted this House. "What, then, will run the island?" And in answer to that question, which demanded an immediate solution, the Republican party proposed this measure, which we believe is established in justice and founded in wisdom. [Applause on the Republican side.]

TRUSTS FAVOR FREE TRADE.

The third cause of public clamor to which I desire hastily to advert was the charge that this measure was dictated by trusts—a charge that has been made by the leader of the Democratic party on this floor this morning. Why, Mr. Speaker, what more natural than that these shrewd and active business men who are manipulating the great sugar and tobacco trusts of the country, after the President had sent his message to Congress recommending free trade, should, by their agents, have bought up all the sugar and tobacco in that island—bought it up with the understanding that the Dingley rates were to be paid upon it? What more probable than that this should have occurred? Will these gentlemen, who are so conversant with the situation and so familiar with conditions throughout the world, permit an opportunity of that kind to pass by?

But, sir, I am not left to the field of conjecture or the realm of speculation on this proposition. Hear what Mr. Havemeyer, the president of the American Sugar Refining Company, says on the subject:

NEW YORK, March 29.

President Havemeyer, of the American Sugar Refining Company, was the center of interest in speculative circles to-day, owing to the cut of 5 cents a hundred pounds announced by the Arbuckles and the possible action of the Havemeyer interests. The sugar king, in discussing the whole situation, was plain and outspoken regarding the position of Porto Rico and the Philippines, and declared that there was no reason in the world why sugars should not be admitted free of duty from these countries.

Then the great sugar king turns constitutional lawyer, as so many gentlemen have essayed to do here, and exclaimed:

I am much in favor of it—

He said—

and I believe the time is not far off when they will be admitted free of duty. Why, both of these countries are part and parcel of the United States, and, no matter what action Congress takes, I am confident the Supreme Court will hold that the products of those islands are entitled to free entry here.

There is no more reason why a duty should be placed upon the products of Porto Rico than on stuff coming into New York from Long Island. There is only a wide ditch between the United States and Porto Rico. Well, if Porto Rican sugars are brought in free it will not be long before some similar policy is adopted with reference to Cuban products.

There are no refineries in Porto Rico; they are all located here, and the trust naturally wants all raw sugar imported free, to be refined here.

Are we so infatuated with our previous predilections on this proposition as to believe that these gentlemen would argue that a tariff is unconstitutional and yet be here seeking to have a tariff imposed upon the product that they own? Not alone that, but hear what Mr. Townes, president of the Porto Rico-American Tobacco Company says:

W. T. Townes, president of the Porto Rico-American Tobacco Company says that the proposed tariff will keep Porto Rico out of the American market; that Porto Rico will sell to Europe, China, and Japan, and not a pound to the United States.

Are we to believe that this gentlemen is seeking to have a tariff imposed upon his product and to drive himself out of this market, the greatest and the richest market in the world?

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another reason higher and better than that, one that is undisputed and indisputable, one that is unanswered and unanswerable. Only a few weeks ago a suit was brought against the collector of customs in the city of New York to recover some $2,000,000, the $2,000,000 that we by our action voted to Porto Rico for the rehabilitation of that island. Who were the plaintiffs in that suit? Lawrence Turnure & Co.; the American Sugar Refining Company; L. W. & P. Armstrong; Muller, Schall & Co.; in other words, the sugar trust and its allied interests. And what was the origin of that suit?

It will be remembered that the full Dingley tariff is yet in operation between this country and Porto Rico, and that under its operation $1,800,000 was collected as duty on sugar and $200,000 as duty on tobacco coming into this country from Porto Rico between the date of the acquisition of that island and the 1st day of January, 1900.

The American sugar trust and those representing its interests claim now that they paid that duty, that they paid that $1,800,000, and are seeking to recover it back from the Government. Gentlemen, are we so lost in the mazes of sentiment that we shall fail to look this question fairly in the face as it confronts us? Do we suppose for a moment that this great sugar trust is in court in New York seeking to recover back the tariff duty which it alleges it has paid, and at the same time is here seeking to have a tariff duty imposed upon itself and its own products? Are those gentlemen so patriotic as to impose a tax upon themselves? Is it possible that they would be yonder in New York seeking to reclaim money which they allege they have paid, and yet be here seeking to have other money collected from them in the nature of a tariff?

But not only that, Mr. Speaker; the only voice that has been raised on this proposition, so far as the public knows, has come from the Hon. JAMES K. JONES, the senior Senator from Arkansas. What was the amendment to this bill which he introduced in the Senate? Listen to it:

That all duties collected to this date upon articles imported into the United States from Porto Rico since the 11th day of April, 1899, the date of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace between Spain and the United States, be returned to the persons from whom they were collected, and from and after the passage of this act no duties shall be collected on articles coming from Porto Rico.

In other words, after the American sugar trust has alleged that it paid these duties, after the American sugar trust has charged in the court that these duties were wrung from it, Senator JAMES K. JONES comes into the United States Senate and proposes as an amendment to this bill to give back every dollar to the American sugar trust, the very money which we have voted to Porto Rico to establish her government and save her people from starvation; and yet they charge that the trust produced this change in the minds of the Committee on Ways and Means and the President of the United States! [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, sir, we frequently hear the questions asked, "If these trusts pay the tariff, why reduce it? Why not permit the full Dingley rates to stand?" The answer is not far to seek; because, with the tariff as it now is, the trusts would not move their products. They can afford to permit them to lie in Porto Rican warehouses for several years, knowing that free trade will ultimately come, rather than pay $1.60 on every hundred pounds of sugar and 35 cents on every pound of tobacco. And the committee, in fixing the rate of 25 per cent in the original House bill, endeavored to so arrange it that these trusts could not afford to wait for a further reduction in the tariff rate.

HAWAII AND PORTO RICO.

Another cause of discontent on this proposition is the comparison raised in the public mind between Hawaii and Porto Rico. "Why," they say to us, "Hawaii and Porto Rico are both alike. They stand upon a common basis. Why does not this great Republic treat them alike? If we give free trade to Hawaii, why not give it to Porto Rico?"

Mr. Speaker, why do we not treat them alike? Simply because they are not alike; simply because the conditions are widely different and diverse.

Again we must meet the conditions that confront us. Again we must deal with things as they are, and not as we would wish them to be.

The conditions as to government are unlike. Hawaii has had self-government for eighty years; Porto Rico, never. Hawaii has had a republican form of government for seven years; Porto Rico, never. Hawaii has a government that can wisely levy, impartially collect, and judiciously expend taxes; Porto Rico has no government whatever, save the military power of this nation.

The conditions prevailing among the people are unlike. In Hawaii 80 per cent of the people can read and write; in Porto Rico 90 per cent can neither read nor write. Hawaii has over 200 schools in full operation; Porto Rico has but one, and it established within the last six months. Hawaii has a complete school system, with colleges and high schools and common schools; Porto Rico sits wrapped in the gloom of ignorance and the darkness of superstition.

In Hawaii the people are prosperous and intelligent, industrious, thrifty, and self-sustaining, and need no aid from without.

General Davis best describes the sad estate of the Porto Rican:

Spain ground the natives to earth for centuries, wrenched from them in taxes, imposts, fines, or bribes the rewards of their toil, but ever held before them the assurance that they were the children of the Crown and its constant care. By keeping them in ignorance and poverty, with a plentiful display of military effulgence to awe them, * * * it is easy to understand why we found them in this condition, and to appreciate the burden of lifting them up to a realization of their rights, duties, and responsibilities as American citizens.

By the treaty of Paris nearly 1,000,000 inhabitants of Porto Rico have come under the laws of the Union. They are unused to American laws and customs, and have had in the past no initiation. They were taught and forced to rely upon the Government in any and every important undertaking or proposition. They have been thoroughly taught to obey, but know little of self-reliance. Is it surprising that the obliteration of one-third of the wealth of the island, other than the soil itself, has been followed with industrial paralysis? So I have to hear the appeals, most piteous appeals, for help from almost every hamlet. They see no way to turn but to the way they have always turned, i. e., to the Government, and as its representative here I must hear and dispose of those appeals.

The physical conditions of these countries are as wide apart as the poles. Hawaii's rich fields are everywhere subdued and everywhere yield a bounteous harvest. Her valleys and her hillsides are the abodes of a prosperous people, who own and cultivate their soil, and no disaster has marched across the land leaving despair and death in its wake.

Not so Porto Rico. The most disastrous calamity that ever befell one entire people swept down upon her last August. Three-fourths of the current wealth of the island was caught up in the arms of the wind and hurled into the sea. Thousands of her people are homeless, more thousands destitute. A half million are out of employment and must subsist on charity. Again I appeal to General Davis for adequate words to describe the appalling condition:

The coffee lands suffered worst. These trees are planted on the hill and mountain slopes, and in many places the declivities are very abrupt. The gale tore up the trees, loosened the soil, and the deluge of water converted the earth into a semifluid.

Then followed landslides, and thousands of acres of coffee plantations slid down into the valley; trees, soil, rocks, and every vestige of culture are piled up in the bottom of the valleys. In such case there is no restoration possible, for where there were smiling groves are now only bald rocks which were uncovered by the avalanches.

Where the soil was not disturbed the most of the coffee trees were either uprooted, broken off, or stripped of foliage and the immature berries. The larger trees of other varieties, which are habitually grown for shade to the coffee, were blown down, and their protection to the coffee trees is also gone; so where the trees are not wholly denuded the protection of the berries from the sun's heat is absent, and the green fruit is blighted and spoiled.

It will take five years to reestablish these coffee vegas, and these will be necessarily years of want and industrial paralysis.

Sir, such is the situation that confronts us. Must we, therefore, treat the islands, whose conditions are so dissimilar, precisely alike? Do we deal with the helpless and the destitute and the starving as we do the prosperous, the thrifty, the self-sustaining? What would be thought of a physician who would administer the same remedy for all diseases? What would be the world's estimate of that statesmanship which would so far forsake realities as to provide the same legislative remedies for a people who sit in the sunshine of civilization and those who are wrapped in the night of ignorance, for those who are prosperous and self-sustaining and those who are destitute and in rags, for those who enjoy a stable government and those who know not the form or function of any government? Sir, the very statement of the proposition not only refutes it but renders it well-nigh absurd to every thinking man.

THE PROPOSED MEASURE WISE AND GENEROUS.

Mr. Speaker, the statement has been frequently made and oft repeated that this measure deals illiberally and ungenerously with Porto Rico. But, sir, a very hasty examination of its provisions will dispel that false conception.

Heretofore when this nation has acquired territory it has at once extended its system of internal-revenue taxation over it, and every dollar thus obtained has gone into the Treasury of the nation. But, sir, under the provisions of this bill every dollar of revenue thus derived goes into a separate fund for the benefit of that island and its people. Is that illiberal?

Heretofore when we have acquired territory we have at once thrown around it the provisions of our tariff laws, and every dollar of customs duties thus paid by those people has gone into the general Treasury of the country. But, sir, under the provisions of this bill every dollar collected at the ports of Porto Rico and at the ports of this country goes into a separate fund for the benefit of Porto Rico and her people. Is that ungenerous?

We throw the Dingley tariff around the island and compel all nations except ours to pay the rates provided by that law on all their products that enter that island. This fund we give to the Porto Ricans for their exclusive benefit. Is that un-American?

Sir, this is not an original tariff that we are imposing upon the products of Porto Rico coming into this country, for it must not be forgotten that the Dingley law is yet in full operation as to such products and has been since its enactment. This should be entitled "A bill to reduce the tariff on all products coming into Porto Rico from the United States and to regulate the tariff on all products coming into the United States from Porto Rico," for by its provisions we reduce the tariff on all such products 85 per cent, and give every dollar of it collected here and collected there to Porto Rico and her people. We do not even take out of it a dollar to pay the expenses of our military government there. We do not take out of it a cent to pay for collecting this duty. We give it all, all to that island for its government and its people. Is that immoral?

We have never dealt so generously with any other Territory. We have to-day a special tax on industries in Alaska. Among the many pursuits embraced in the law for which license fees are to be paid are the following: Banks, $250; brokers, $100; billiard rooms, $15; breweries, $500; electric-light plants furnishing light or power for sale, $300; hotels, $50; jewelers, $25; quartz mills, $3 per stamp; meat markets, $15; railroads, $100 per mile upon each mile operated; sawmills, 10 cents per thousand feet upon the lumber sawed; theaters, $100. To this law, passed last session, nobody objected. And permit me to say to the gentlemen whose self-imposed duty it is to guard the Constitution here and save it from the ravages of those who would destroy it, that, if we have a right to impose these special taxes in Alaska, we would have a right to place a tariff on the imports from Alaska; and if we have the right to impose a tariff on the products of Alaska coming into this country, we have a right to impose such a tariff on the products of Porto Rico. Can this be denied? And yet when the Alaskan bill was passed no man raised his voice to prevent this fracture of the Constitution, no man characterized it as ungenerous and immoral or raised his voice in defense of a stricken people.

It will not be forgotten either that under the provisions of this bill all food products go into Porto Rico free of tariff duties. Every article that is necessary for the immediate use of the people, or that will aid in building up their prostrate industries, goes into their ports free of tariff.

What, then, is this bill? Practically, sir, to place a tariff for two years on the sugar and the tobacco of the island when they are brought into this country. Is there anything unjust in this proposition?

Until their government is organized, what else shall we do? You gentlemen contend that Porto Rico to-day is doing nothing toward sustaining her own government. Shall we not tax tobacco and sugar, two of the staple products of that island? We admit her coffee free; shall all her products escape? Sir, if gentlemen here are to be believed, and we must have free trade between that country and this, we shall collect no tax whatever on sugar and tobacco. This Congress can not go into the warehouses on that island and collect a tax upon sugar and tobacco; and so, if their theory is correct, sugar and tobacco, two of the great staples of that island, shall wholly escape taxation. Why, Mr. Speaker, is that to be the policy of this country? Shall we not compel the people in that island, in so far as they have the power and ability to do so, to furnish the revenues to operate their government?

I maintain that these products should be compelled to pay their just proportion of the burden of taxation. If so, we must tax them in the warehouses of Porto Rico or collect a tariff on them when they enter our ports. We have the same right under the Constitution to do the one thing as to do the other, to pursue the one course as to pursue the other. Therefore, why hesitate, why cavil, why delay?

This tariff the first year will be paid by the trusts. The second year it will be paid by the planters, nearly every one of whom is a Spaniard and very few, if any, of whom are Americans.

One gentleman who was here demanding free trade testified that he had $800,000 invested in a sugar plantation in that island. He said that he was a British subject and that he never intended to become an American citizen. He was quite anxious to have the product of his plantation enter our ports free from tariff taxation, and he filled the newspapers with his lamentations over the sad condition of these people. He wanted to enjoy the protection of this great nation, but was not willing to pay one cent for it, to contribute one penny toward maintaining it.

But, Mr. Speaker, how will free trade benefit the people of that island? Sir, we are daily confronted with startling headlines in the newspapers informing us of the poverty and the destitution in the island of Porto Rico, and the catalogue of adjectives is exhausted in describing the pitiable condition in that unfortunate island. But, sir, would free trade benefit these people? Would it, my Democratic friends? Under this bill as it is now all food products go in free. They could be made no freer by any other bill. If these people are starving, it is evident that they have nothing to sell. Of what advantage is a market to a man who has nothing to sell? Of what advantage is an open door to a man if he has nothing to carry in or out of it? Free trade simply means an opportunity to sell without restriction.

How can the 900,000 poverty-stricken, destitute people of that island obtain any benefit from free trade with this country when the 900,000 people have nothing to sell, when they do not own a pound of sugar or a pound of tobacco? What they need is immediate relief. Immediate relief is not to be accomplished by free trade, but by cash, and the best way in which they can obtain this cash with which to rehabilitate their stricken island and provide for their immediate necessities is by this tariff, which is levied upon sugar and tobacco and not upon the starving thousands of Porto Rico. In other words, we tax those who are able to stand it for the benefit of all the people. Is this ungenerous?

I hold in my hand a letter from Col. William H. Elliott, of my own district, who is the able and efficient director of posts in the island of Porto Rico. He says:

> There is not now any just system of taxation, and time is needed to organize, adjust, equalize, and bring into operation under economical administration any kind of system; and to produce a revenue large enough to meet the actual needs of government, road improvement, school, charity, etc., would put an enormous burden on the people. They see in the 15 per cent a revenue they would not feel as a burden, and which would help largely to restore the waste places. The 15 per cent is so small a portion of the tariff now imposed that it would operate as a very great relief, and it would bring with it assurance of a settlement of the contention, trade and commerce would feel the impulse, and business would go on just as energetically as it would were free trade to be granted. The general expression here is of astonishment that anybody in the States should consider the 15 per cent proposition an injustice to Porto Rico. It is deemed a benefit in the light of a great need of money for public improvements and the consequent employment of labor.
> At first I considered that it would be best, as a guard against the charge of imperialism, to treat Porto Rico on a Territorial basis; but as the subject has developed under my observation I have become convinced that the greatest favor possible to bestow upon the people, and the surest means of providing for the recuperation of the island from all causes of depression, poverty, and suffering, is to be found in some provision for a revenue that will not be felt as a burden of taxation, and the proposed 15 per cent duty, it occurs to me, will come nearer to that than any other plan.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it will not escape observation that this bill provides for the organization of a civil government on that island, and that as soon as such government is in operation, as soon as it can levy and collect taxes, this tariff shall cease and free trade shall thenceforth be the policy as between this country and that island. Is that unreasonable? Is that unjust? Is that oppressive?

Sir, this is substantially what Davis recommended. This is what we all believe. The ultimate policy is to be free trade, and we step aside from that policy for a few months to meet a crying emergency that can not so well be met in any other way. Mr. Speaker, emergencies frequently override settled policies. It is the policy of this country to maintain peace, and yet when an emergency arises we do not hesitate to temporarily step aside from that policy and rush into the most sanguinary conflicts. It is the policy of this country to remain free from debt, and yet when certain conditions confront us we do not hesitate to issue bonds, to borrow freely, to assume a great burden of debt. And so, sir, the policy of this nation with reference to Porto Rico is free trade; but we shall not hesitate to set aside that policy for a few months in order to meet an exigent necessity and do justice to a stricken people. [Great applause.]

Hear what General Davis says on this proposition. I commend his words to those who so hung upon them when he is said to have recommended free trade:

> The island must, it is supposed, ultimately derive its principal revenue from internal taxation, but this can not be until a new scheme of taxation for the whole island can be worked out. This work requires very careful consideration and can not be properly done until the general policy to be pursued with respect to the future status of Porto Rico is known. .

And again he says:

> It is recommended that the trade between the United States and the island be left as free as possible, and that the customs revenues collected here be left to the island temporarily as an income for local expenditure. As soon as a new local internal-revenue tax law can be framed and put into operation, the custom-house collections would inure to the General Treasury, but for a few years it will be very difficult to balance the budget without this aid.
> The proposition is to make the island self-supporting and to maintain all services here, including posts and quarantine, as a charge against local revenues; to extend the existing wagon roads and railroads; to build hospitals, schools, and asylums; to deepen the harbors; to extend or create dock facilities, and to foster and promote the general welfare by utilizing for this purpose all available resources as the proceeds of wisely placed loans.

I desire also to introduce another witness on this point, to whose testimony I ask careful attention. Henry K. Carroll, special commissioner for the United States to Porto Rico, in his full and able report says with reference to Porto Rican affairs, among other things:

> The taxes need a complete readjustment. The main dependence has been on the customs revenue, and must continue to be until the future government of the island is determined. The estimates of receipts for the year ending June 30, 1898, amounted for both the government and the provincial deputation to $5,157,200.

Of this amount $3,377,900 was derived from customs.

Said he further:

> It must be remembered * * * that large sums will be needed almost immediately for the public schools and for various internal improvements indispensable to the development of Porto Rico. Fortunately there is no debt, so far as can be learned; surpluses have been the rule in the insular accounts, though they do not seem to have been carried over, but used for Spanish exigencies in Cuba and elsewhere.
>
> It would seem to be prudent not to revise the Porto Rican tariff so as very greatly to reduce the customs revenue, at least for the period ad interim.

NOT AN IDEAL CONDITION THAT CONFRONTS US.

Mr. Speaker, another cause of great irritation throughout the land was the fact that his bill, when first brought forward, was a shock to the moral sentiment of our people.

Sir, it is one of the distinguishing characteristics of our national life that the ideal and the real have ever and always been intimately associated, and that in all our historic past they have ever and always been intertwined.

We have become the most masterful people of history because we have always had the wisdom to cherish high ideals and because we have always had the courage to incorporate them in our national life; and we can all agree that the present, with all its mighty responsibilities resting upon us and the stupendous possibilities of the future just before us, is no time to forsake such ideals or abandon the attempt to incorporate them in our institutions.

But, sir, we are also the most realistic people of earth. Along the line of physical development we have accomplished the most prodigious tasks of history. So marked was this characteristic that, previous to the Spanish-American war, we were called a nation of shopkeepers and traders, and it was said of us that we were more devout in our worship of the golden calf than were the Israelites under Aaron's lead. But with the explosion of the Maine there came a seeming change in our national spirit. We were suddenly called from ourselves, our selfishness, our isolation, and made to remember the lofty ideal of our national life. We forgot our vocations for the time being, and remembered only the equality of men.

Sir, we all felt the impelling force of this beautiful sentiment. We all once more caught a glimpse of that "one, far-off, divine event toward which the whole creation moves." We were all once more lifted to the heights of universal brotherhood.

The swift intuitions of the people outrun the slow deductions of logic. They see only the end and are not always careful in selecting the surest way to reach the goal. They want to fly to the conclusion without always giving due heed to the premises. They disdain the slow process of trudging down the mountain side and across the valley and painfully struggling over rock and crag to the opposite summit; they would leap from peak to peak. But it is the business of the statesman to note carefully his immediate surroundings and, keeping ever in view the great end, to watch closely each step. And soon the people will rally to his support, for, as Abraham Lincoln expressed it, "They may wobble for a while, but if they do they will always wobble around and get right."

And so, sir, when we look at the real situation before us, around us, it is not an ideal one.

When we look down into the little island of Porto Rico and find 800,000 people half starved, half clothed, and absolutely ignorant, it is not an ideal condition that confronts us. It is one of the most intense practicality. Sir, if we can not bring the lofty ideal of American citizenship down to fit the Porto Ricans, it is our solemn duty to place our hands beneath them and through the long course of civilization and evolution lift the citizens of Porto Rico up to fit our ideal. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Idealism will not feed the hungry, however beautiful it may be. If a man goes to bed with nothing but idealism in his stomach, his dreams will be entirely too ethereal to be satisfactorily interpreted even by a Joseph. [Laughter and applause.]

Something practical is demanded. People are naked and starving and ignorant. An island is storm swept and battle scarred and desolate. What must be done? How can we best deal with this problem?

DIRECT TAXATION.

And so, sir, we were compelled to get our heads from out the stars and put our feet upon the earth and without delay answer an instant and pressing question.

A careful study disclosed four methods of raising the money which these people needed, and needed at once.

The first was direct taxation upon the island. But a very hasty investigation served to convince our leaders that that plan would be impracticable for two reasons. First, there was no governmental machinery on the island by which it could be collected and disbursed; and, second, because of the terrible conditions prevailing in that island direct taxation would have proven intolerable, and the American people would have risen in their might against any party that sought to impose it. A people of whom the following is an accurate description can not bear direct taxation:

They live in huts made of sticks and poles covered over with thatches of palm leaves. A family of a dozen may be huddled together in one room, often the most scanty clothing, while children of less than 7 or 8 years are often entirely naked. A few may own a machete or a hoe, but more have no worldly possessions whatever. Their food is fruit, and, if they are wage earners, a little rice and codfish in addition.

General Davis said on this point:

> A general system of taxation to produce revenue enough to carry on the government would amount to confiscation.
>
> Mr. PETTIGREW. Can you collect revenue enough to maintain the government?
>
> General DAVIS. Not for two or three years on any basis.

General Davis was asked by Mr. NELSON:

> Have you any system of taxation akin to our internal-revenue taxation?
>
> General DAVIS. Only on two articles. One, the liquor tax, of which I have spoken, of 3 cents a liter, and the other a tax on matches—the manufacture of matches.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Do you levy the tax readily, or with difficulty?
>
> General DAVIS. With difficulty. No man pays his tax readily.

A LOAN ON THE ISLAND.

The second method of raising revenue with which to meet the pressing necessities of the hour was by making a loan on the island. The distinguished leader of our party on the floor [Mr. PAYNE] informs us that such a method was fully discussed. Why was it not adopted?

First, because there was no government to authorize it.

Second, because it would not be obtained at a less rate than 7 per cent.

It was deemed unwise and inexpedient that the present of the island should be hampered and its future hindered by placing a mortgage of $10,000,000 upon it, and especially at a rate twice as great as we are compelled to pay. Some day we may want to annex Cuba, and the people of that fair island would not be easily convinced of our generous and unselfish intentions when, looking across the channel which separates them from Porto Rico, they could see the huge debt piled up there by this country.

DIRECT APPROPRIATION FROM TREASURY.

The next manner in which the necessary revenue could be raised was an appropriation from the Treasury. But, Mr. Speaker, while originally I believed that that was the proper method for raising this revenue, yet when I looked at all the arguments on both sides of it I became convinced that it was dangerous for us and injurious to the people of that island. We have already been generous with Porto Rico. We have given her many hundreds and thousands of dollars. Our people are ever ready to lead her, to guide her, but, sir, they are not willing to carry her.

We believe that these people should be taught the lesson of self-reliance, of self-confidence; they should be accustomed, Mr. Speaker, to the hard knocks that make men and that lead to ultimate civilization and ultimate triumph. There is no short cut to the heights of civilization. There is no primrose path up the mountain steep of experience. These people must be taught to labor into it, to struggle into it, to suffer into it, until at last by slow steps they ascend to the lofty plane whereon we stand, and there is no other method by which evolution works. [Applause on the Republican side.] Our Democratic friends would have said "Why, we have recently annexed 1,500 islands to this country. None of them have internal or domestic improvements; none of them have railroads; none of them have schoolhouses."

They would have gone forth on the stump throughout the length and breadth of this country and said: "Have we annexed 1,500 poorhouses to the Republic? Have we established 1,500 benevolent institutions? How long is this to continue? How long is the Treasury of the Republic to be drawn upon in the interest of these people? If a million people in this little island of Porto Rico is to cost us so much, what may we expect of millions in the Philippines, with their vast and undeveloped expanse of territory? This war and its results have already cost you people three hundred millions of money. How much longer will you submit to be thus taxed for the benefit of a people who live on the richest lands of earth, but who are required under the Republican policy to contribute nothing toward the support of their government?" They would have gone to the farmers in my county and said: "When you wanted to build roads, you laid a tax of 2 per cent on yourselves, your real and personal property, to construct them. But the Republican party comes along and lays an additional burden upon you to build the roads in rich Porto Rico and at the same time they permit the great sugar interest and tobacco interest to go wholly untaxed." That argument would have been absolutely unanswerable.

TARIFF MEASURE.

The only method left, Mr. Speaker, by which this needed revenue could be raised was that provided for in this bill. As I have already fully discussed it, I shall not again call attention to its provisions further than to say that it is in no sense a protective measure, but one for revenue only.

Fifteen per cent of the Dingley rate amounts to a tariff of but 6 per cent, and that is not a protective tariff. The sugar and tobacco products of Porto Rico are so inconsequential, when compared to our vast consumption of those articles, that if they were multiplied many times they would not injuriously affect our people engaged in those great industries.

This bill is a temporary revenue measure, to meet an immediate demand, and was conceived in a spirit of the highest generosity and for the well-being solely of the prostrate people of the "Pearl of the Antilles." [Applause.]

That is an exact statement of the situation; and, sir, I undertake to say that when the people of this country come to understand this measure, it will be given that cordial support, that hearty sympathy, that it should meet with here in this House to-day by the vote of every man who loves the Republican party. [Applause.]

WHOLE DOCTRINE OF EXPANSION INVOLVED.

Mr. Speaker, no sooner had this bill been brought forward in the House than the Democratic party, true to its instincts and history, set up the cry that it was unconstitutional. From first to last, save with few notable exceptions, the contest here was waged upon that issue. The practical phase, the emergency nature, of the measure was lost sight of, and this doubtless added to the confusion already existing in the minds of the people in regard to this bill.

Sir, when the Democratic party assailed the constitutionality of this measure, the Republican party at once accepted the issue and rallied to its support, for the two fundamental principles of our party—protection and expansion—became immediately involved.

If the Constitution extends over Porto Rico, it extends over the Philippines. If we must have free trade with one, we must have free trade with the other. What does this mean? Sir, a measure of such far-reaching consequences and such wide-extended results can not be brushed aside by any herald of resounding theories, but must be settled by the wisest, most sagacious, and most patriotic statesmanship of the land.

In the treaty of peace with Spain, by which we acquired title to the Philippines, we entered into the following agreement:

ART. IV. The United States will, for the term of ten years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of the present treaty, admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States.

And so, sir, under the provisions of this solemn compact, if the Philippines must have free trade with the United States, she must also have free trade with Spain. The ships and merchandise of both must be treated alike.

But that is not all. We have a treaty with each commercial power of the world, in which we have a "favored-nation" clause, stipulating that we will accord to such nations all the trade rights and privileges that we accord to the most-favored nation. That means that if Spain must have free trade with the Philippines, all the nations of the earth with whom we have such treaties must likewise have free trade with the Philippines.

What does that signify? Sir, free trade with all the world. In other words, if the Congress has no power to levy duties upon exports from this country to the Philippines and upon exports from there to the United States because they are a part of our nation, an open door in the Philippines would mean absolute free trade with the United States as to all nations concerned; not simply free trade in the sense that we could not levy a protective tariff duty, but free trade in the sense that we could not levy against such nations even a revenue tariff. This would be attended with results of such momentous and disastrous consequences that it would be nothing short of stupid criminality for us to hastily rush into it.

Mr. Speaker, are we ready to abandon the great doctrine of protection? Sir, that principle has made us great and grand. It has called forth the bud and blossom of our wondrous civilization. It has subdued half a continent and to-day finds our flag wafted by the breezes of two oceans. It has felled forests and conquered prairies, established exhaustless reservoirs of national wealth and opened the greatest granaries of the world. It has touched the earth, and fountains of unmeasured wealth have gushed forth. It has lighted the fires of industry in a thousand valleys and upon a thousand hills. It has brought the richest returns for capital and the highest rewards for labor. In short, it has, in a few brief years, brought our Republic to that condition that, having one-twentieth of the population of the globe, we yet own one-half of all its telegraph and telephone lines, we do one-third of its mining, one-fourth of its manufacturing, one-fifth of its agriculture, and own one-sixth of all its wealth. [Great applause on the Republican side.] Are you ready to abandon it? For thirty-five years it has been the shibboleth of the Republican party. Shall we discard it now?

The Democratic party has always been the enemy of protection. They are very naturally for free trade, not with Porto Rico alone, not with the Philippines alone, but with the whole world. Shall we permit them to do indirectly what they dare not longer attempt to do directly?

Mr. Speaker, I am a firm believer in the doctrine of expansion. I believe that we should retain the Philippines; retain them for their good and for our benefit; retain them for reasons strategic, reasons commercial, and reasons political. But, sir, it must be determined that we have a right to govern with a free hand; that we have a right to govern them as we did Louisiana, as we did Florida, as we do Alaska, as we do Hawaii; govern them as their necessities demand and their conditions warrant, or the difficulties of the problem will be multiplied a thousand fold.

The idea that we have not this power is, to me, unthinkable. The idea that we must admit 10,000,000 half-naked savages to all the rights, benefits, immunities, privileges, and blessings of this Government—of which they have no more conception than the eyeless fish in Mammoth Cave have of the glories of the noonday sun—is to me absurd. The idea that we must abandon our protective-tariff policy in order to retain these possessions is to me the very extreme of folly.

When the Supreme Court decide the question as to our rights and powers, as they will be asked to do if we pass this bill, we shall then be able to ascertain our situation, to take our bearings, to mark out our pathway for the future; and, knowing by heart our duty and remembering always our high calling, we shall march forward to that destiny for which God designed us. [Applause.]

NO NEW DOCTRINE.

Mr. Speaker, it is no new doctrine that is announced here. Since the acquisition of Porto Rico the full Dingley tariff has been, and still is, in full operation as against her products, and nobody has ever been heard to denounce it. Not until we sought to reduce it 85 per cent was there any outcry on the subject.

Two years ago we annexed Hawaii to this country. From that day to this the full Dingley tariff has been maintained as against all the products of that island coming here, and yet no voice has ever been raised to denounce it as ungenerous or illiberal or un-American or unconstitutional.

As I had occasion to remark before in the course of this speech, we have owned Alaska for many years, we have never permitted her to be represented here, and we have seen fit to lay special taxes upon her; but no man has ever lifted his voice to denounce our course or decry our policy. It is only when political capital is to be made of it that the Democratic party raises the hue and cry that this just and salutary measure is unjust, ungenerous, un-American, and unconstitutional. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE ATTITUDE OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

But, gentlemen of the Democracy, what do you propose? What plan do you suggest? If this bill be so iniquitous, what substitute for it do you offer? What measure of relief will you bring forward?

You who preach the sad gospel of despair from the windows of Noah's ark, high priests in the moldy temple of pessimism, what do you propose? [Applause.]

You who march into the future backwards and translate the present upside down [laughter and applause]; you who circle around in a dead eddy and imagine yourselves in the center of the swelling current of history; you who mark time and vainly think yourselves marching triumphantly in the van of the army of progress, what method do you suggest? [Applause.]

You who fondly cling to musty banners upon which are inscribed obsolete legends and decadent theories; you who stand amidst dead dogmas, cast-off principles, and exploded platforms as thick as autumn leaves, what plan do you offer? Have you any theory? State it. Have you any idea? Announce it. Have you any method? Formulate it. Have you any constructive ability? Demonstrate it. Let the people of this Republic know what you propose. Let them know your scheme of dealing with present problems and future complications.

Ah! Mr. Speaker, out from the Democratic tomb there comes no voice that can direct the people of this Republic in the trying crisis that confronts us.

What has been the attitude of that pessimistic party from the inception of this controversy to the present moment? Denunciation, criticism, complaint. Negative always, affirmative never. Destructive always, constructive never. Pessimistic always, optimistic never. Doubting, disputing, quibbling, objecting. Self-constituted sentinels upon the watchtower of liberty, they are ever prophets of evil, ever warning us of dangers which do not threaten, ever crying out against impending calamities which can not occur.

That party is opposed in this instance to expansion. And why, manifestly because they did not originate it. Obviously because it is the handiwork of a Republican Administration.

The map which I append to my speech shows that, in the heroic days of the Democratic party and before it lost its aggressiveness and degenerated into a mere party of obstruction, it was the champion of expansion and long ago patriotically answered all the questions asked by its carping representatives to-day.

They remember the havoc wrought by their own doctrine of free trade in that carnival of soup and rags to which they invited us in 1894. [Laughter and applause.] If they can force a construction of the Constitution that would make the Philippines a part of our country, if they can compel us to the doctrine that we must have free trade with those islands, they will then bring forth their own skeleton and endeavor with it to terrify the laboring men and the farmers of the Republic. They thus seek to take advantage of their own great wrong.

What else? While William Jennings Bryan, the peripatetic petitioner for the Presidency, is roving over the country bewailing the sad estate of the laboring man, upon whose helpless soul the tentacles of the octopus are about to fasten, and bemoaning the imperial ascendency of trusts, the chairman of his national committee, Senator JAMES K. JONES, introduces a bill into Congress to make a present of $1,800,000 to one of the most powerful trusts in the land, the very money with which we have sought to alleviate the distress in Porto Rico, of which they so vehemently declaim.

They have searched all dictionaries in order to amplify their vocabulary of lugubrious adjectives, so as to adequately describe the pitiful condition of starving Porto Ricans, and, with a cheerfulness indescribable, have voted against every measure of relief proposed. [Laughter and applause.]

They feast on the misfortunes of the people and fatten on the calamities of the nation.

Sir, what has been their attitude since the beginning of the Spanish-American war? We all know, sir; we all remember vividly. We remember that they tipped their arrows with malice and steeped their spears in hatred, and they hurled them in showers at the breast of William McKinley. We know that they exhausted the argument of vilification and the logic of slander. We know that the President of the Republic was deluged with epithets; and why? Simply because he did not rush into war with Spain before he was ready for war—before ships had been collected, before munitions of war had been purchased, before our boys had been properly armed and clothed. And afterwards, Mr. Speaker, when the rushing tide of public opinion carried us into war, the Democratic party in this House was practically the first to turn its back upon the President of the United States and the flag of the Republic. Why, sir, they gloated more over a few cans of spoiled beef than over the undying fame achieved by our gallant tars in Manila Bay. They rejoiced more over the bad sanitation of a few camps than over the imperishable glories of Santiago. Is not that true?

What, then, is their proposition? Simply that this measure is unconstitutional. If these gentlemen are to be believed, the Constitution is a prison with the windows all in the rear. We can see backward, but can never catch a glimpse of the future. The walls are forever established. They can never be enlarged to meet the exigencies of advancing civilization, to meet the demands of the children of this Republic yet to be.

Mr. Speaker, what is the Constitution? It is a collection of elemental principles laid down for our guidance. It is not the cause of our liberty, but the result of it. It took six thousand years of struggle and endeavor to make possible that instrument. It was born of the spirit of progress, and it must be interpreted in accordance with that spirit. It does not prevent progress, but, like a finger board, points out the way along which we must march.

If it be a wall, it is one built behind us to prevent our retrogression rather than before us to prevent our advancement. But the Democratic party, with its face always to the rear, imagines that it is in front of us and stays our onward march. [Laughter and applause.]

Why, sir, if I have read history aright, there was once a party in this nation that held that it was "unconstitutional" to save the Union; who proclaimed that the Declaration of Independence was "unconstitutional;" that the equality of all men was "unconstitutional." They announced the astounding doctrine that the Constitution gave this Union power to destroy itself, and that the idea that the nation was greater than any State was "unconstitutional." They held that it was "unconstitutional" to coerce a sovereign State or to attempt to perpetuate the Republic.

They claimed that the greenback was "unconstitutional," that a protective tariff was "unconstitutional," that the gold standard is "unconstitutional." Every forward movement that has added glory to our flag and prestige to our Republic has been met with that same cry, "unconstitutional." If the Democratic party had had its sweet will, this country would to-day be precisely where it was fifty years ago. Had their interpretation of the Constitution been accepted, all progress would have been prevented, all development would have been impossible.

What do they now propose with reference to Porto Rico? Nothing, absolutely nothing. What do they now propose with reference to the Philippines? Nothing, absolutely nothing. The Republican party alone has a solution for this problem. The Republican party alone is competent to grapple with this question. What do we propose? First, to subdue that insurrection, an insurrection on our territory and against the authority of our flag [applause]; second, to establish as soon as practicable a government adapted to their needs and suitable to their condition; third, to hold them by the hand and through the coming years lead them up the steeps of civilization; then, by and by, in some far-off day, when they shall have advanced to the plane whereon we stand, either open wide the doors of the Republic and bid them enter and become one of the sisterhood of States or else to cast them adrift as a separate people and bid them Godspeed upon the highway of history and in the race of nations.

But the Republican party is the only party that is able to solve that problem. The Democratic party is hopelessly bewildered in the presence of this momentous question. It is utterly without method, plan, or purpose. It simply opposes everything and proposes nothing. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But we may expect at every step on the march to have the unreasonable and malignant opposition of the Democratic party. But History, ever candid, always just, will inscribe above your record in this crisis those burning words, "False and faithless," just as she has written them over every act of your party for the last fifty years of our history.

Mr. Speaker, viewed from a lofty and unselfish height, the coming of these possessions into our hands is but to enable us to disseminate the principles of free government and propagate the divine idea of the equality of men; and, sir, we shall not prove recreant to that high trust. We shall come full armed and panoplied to the contest. Providence did not thrust this great duty upon us until we were grandly prepared to discharge it, until we stood proudly superior to all the world in wealth, intelligence, and morality, and until our own Republic was forever established upon the enduring foundations of freedom.

And how splendid has been the progress of that idea in our own land. In the war of the Revolution our fathers contended for liberty, but they contended for their own liberty. The men of '61 advanced the standard. They contended for the liberty of others, but in their own land and under their own flag; but the boys of '98 have advanced still higher the standard. They, too, have contended for liberty, not their own, not that of others in their own land and under their own flag, but for the liberty of those in a foreign country and under a strange flag. The first war established liberty, the second equality, the third fraternity, and under the divine inspiration of that conflict our reunited country, solemnly commissioned of God, has entered at last upon its sacred duty of teaching the nations how to live. [Great applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is at the head of the minority of the Committee on Insular Affairs, and I yield to him thirty minutes, to use as he sees fit.

[Mr. JONES of Virginia addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX].

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, of course it need not be expected of me to discuss this bill very extensively in the time allotted me. I do not agree with our distinguished leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] in their complaint about the short time that has been allowed for the discussion of this bill. I am only surprised that you gentlemen allowed so much time—actually. Now, there is one way to drench a horse, and that is to lead him to the fence and pour it down his throat, and the quicker it is down the better. Now, you have got on your side many that do not like to take this dose, but you have got to march up to the rack and swallow it, and the sooner you do it the better.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] cited as a precedent for this rule one that was adopted in the consideration of the Wilson bill. Now, my distinguished friend was not altogether fair in that. He did not exercise that discriminating mind that he usually does. The difference between that bill and this one which is presented to us to-day is this: That bill had been before the House and before the Senate for months. It was a tariff bill. It had been fully discussed in every particular all along the line; and when it was returned from the Senate it was referred to the committee to which it belonged, and there lay for some time until it was fully discussed by the members of that committee and then reported to this House.

Now, what is this bill? As to the tariff feature of this bill, I will freely admit that it would be a proper precedent for him to cite the rule that was adopted in the consideration of the Wilson bill. But here is a bill that went from this House as a tariff measure and had added to it in the Senate a so-called Territorial form of government, which belonged to the Committee on Insular Affairs of this House, and which under the rules of this House should be considered and reported by them back to this House. Now, by the jugglery of some one on the Senate side and some one on this side it is sent to the Committee on Ways and Means and dumped into this House without any consideration by the committee to which it belongs; and I assert that it stands here under the rule just adopted without a precedent.

But just a few words on the bill. Gentlemen told us when they presented this bill to this House originally, that after much labor, after much travail, they had come to the conclusion that the Constitution of the United States did not include Porto Rico. They said so in their report; and yet, in this identical bill in which you have proposed to make the inhabitants of Porto Rico citizens of Porto Rico, in this Territorial form of government proposed, you say the officers of that government, before proceeding to exercise the duties which they are called upon to discharge, must take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. And yet you declare and proclaim to the country that the Constitution of the United States does not extend to that island. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Think of such inconsistency. Now, you gentlemen on the other side, responsible for this measure, suppose that a judicial officer, who takes the oath that you have required him to take, is called upon to construe these laws, what prevents him from saying that "I have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and instead of supporting your law I will stand upon the oath I have taken and I will declare your law unconstitutional?" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You gentlemen declare that the Constitution does not prevail in the island of Porto Rico. You deny that its inhabitants are citizens of the United States. You expressly declare that they are citizens of Porto Rico. And yet these citizens who are selected to fill any office in that island must take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. We claim that the Constitution does extend to Porto Rico.

We deny your right to lay a tax upon the imports of these people, but for the sake of argument admit your contention that Porto Rico is not a part of the United States. Then I call your attention to another clause of the Constitution which declares that no tax or duty shall be laid upon the exports of any State, and yet you levy a tariff by this bill of 15 per cent of the Dingley bill on all articles of merchandise coming into Porto Rico from the United States.

Now, here is a deliberate attempt to evade a plain constitutional provision by attempting to conceal with the words "coming into Porto Rico from the United States" the fact that these goods had not been exported from the United States. Now, it is in order to ask this simple question: How is it possible for merchandise from the United States to come into Porto Rico unless it was exported from the United States before it came into Porto Rico? And the fact that our customs officer will collect the duty at Porto Rican ports instead of New York or other United States ports will make it none the less an export tax.

You may have deceived yourselves into thinking that you have evaded the Constitution by this method of juggling with words. If you have, I do not think you will be able to deceive anyone else with ordinary reasoning powers. And one might stop long enough to ask you the question, If Porto Rico is not in the United States, where do you get your authority to levy a duty on our own goods coming into Porto Rico?

After all, this discussion as to whether the Constitution extends to Porto Rico may be laid aside for another question. Does the Constitution extend to this Capitol? Does this body, which derives its origin and its powers from that instrument, intend to respect its provisions? Do you intend to regard the oath that you took when this House was organized, which was to support the Constitution? If you do, then that instrument which is the bulwark of our liberties says that duties, imposts, etc., must be uniform throughout the United States; that no tax shall be laid on merchandise exported from any State. These are limitations that are placed on the powers of Congress. The question is, Does the Constitution extend to you?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS].

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the limited time for this debate is too precious to the people of Porto Rico to be consumed by sophomoric orations to circulate among a dissatisfied constituency. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this session you appointed a Committee on Insular Affairs, consisting of 17 members, to consider the question now before this House. Four months have come and gone, and that committee has never been permitted to consider for one hour a bill for the civil government of Porto Rico.

I want to say for the benefit of the chairman of that committee that he is in sympathy with the people of Porto Rico, and believes they should have a liberal government. He feels in his heart to-day that this is a most infamous measure. We have had hearings before that committee; we have had the Governor-General of the Territory. We have the report of the commission appointed by the President to visit that island and report on a form of government suitable to those people. We have had a part of that commission, we have had delegations from every industry in that island, before us. We spent from early in January until early in February investigating the conditions of Porto Rico and its people, and that committee has been prepared since the 5th day of February to take up and consider intelligently legislation for the people of Porto Rico.

And as a member of the minority of that committee I have endeavored to have it consider a form of government for that island, but they have been prevented by some power behind the throne; and I say up to this time here in April that committee has never given one-half hour to the consideration of a government for the people of Porto Rico.

Why, Mr. Speaker? I will tell you why, and if your side can give any better reason let them answer. The reason was it was the purpose of the supporters of this infamous tariff to keep Porto Rico without a civil government, so you could come here and say to this House and to the country, "They have no government; they have no means of raising taxation and therefore let us give them immediate relief now by tariff duties; they have no way of taxing themselves." You have delayed for months giving those people a civil government, in order that you might argue that because they had no civil government it was necessary to put this tariff upon them to raise revenue. That has been your purpose.

Now, it has been said by some very distinguished Republicans in this House that the President—and I am speaking now of the letters of apology that have been sent out by prominent members of this House to satisfy the people—one distinguished gentleman said:

> The President is but a man, and often has to act and recommend matters before he has that wide information which will enable him to maintain the position which he takes.

He was apologizing for the President's "plain-duty message," intimating that the President was so stupid that when this Congress met, with the report of General Davis before him—and I hold it in my hand—made on the 13th day of October, giving an account of the cyclone in that island, giving an account of the conditions of the people there, telling you how badly they needed revenue, how little property they had to tax, showing the poverty of the people, and the great necessity for immediate relief—I say with all this information before the President when he wrote his message, you insist that he did not understand the situation. I challenge you to show any information that you have now, with reference to conditions in Porto Rico, that you did not have when the President sent his message to this House in December. You have none.

Mr. Speaker, I do not charge that the Republicans are controlled by the sugar trust, but I charge that on the 19th day of January all the leading Republicans here and the President were in favor of free trade with Porto Rico. I charge that these hearings show that on the 22d day of January, three days later, Mr. Oxnard, the only sugar king who has come before the committee of this House, appeared to oppose free trade with Porto Rico.

That was on the 22d, and within one week the leaders of the Republicans were advocating a tariff against the people of Porto Rico, as suggested by Oxnard. You may say the sugar trust controlled you or say what you please; you have not shown the country any other reason for your sudden change, and you never will. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am in favor of taxing the sugar, the coffee, and tobacco of Porto Rico. But tax these products in Porto Rico as the property of Porto Rico for the benefit of the people of Porto Rico. When you pass this bill you have no assurance that you will collect a single dollar from sugar and tobacco imported under it. Why, sir, it is said that as soon as the legislature adopts a form of government and puts it into operation in that island, this tariff law will end; and if it should end within six months, those people who now hold this sugar and tobacco would be free from the operation of this law.

Sir, there is no evidence that this sugar and tobacco is in the hands of a trust; but if it is, why will they not hold on to their sugar and tobacco in Porto Rico and not import it into the United States until the legislature in Porto Rico has acted and they can bring their sugar and tobacco in free? And will not the holders of this sugar and tobacco lobby with the legislature to hasten the early adoption of a form of government? On the other hand, Oxnard will be there to oppose such legislation, and you will have down in Porto Rico the best lobby that ever assembled outside of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

Under the provisions of this bill Porto Rico may be prevented by a lobby from having a form of government and a system of taxation of her own for two years. It is plain to any man who will consider for one moment the effect of this question what the final result will be. It all rests with the appointments of the President. If Oxnard can control the President, he can control the six men who are to be sent down to Porto Rico.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Appointed by the President.

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. Yes; six men appointed by the President. They will feel that they have more liberty when they get down there in Porto Rico. Now, Mr. Speaker, if any Republican of this House is afraid that his people are a little nervous on this question, all he has to do is to get up, as did the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], and read a letter from an appointee of the President, appointed on the recommendation of the member himself, perhaps, indorsing the member who secured his appointment! [Laughter and applause.]

Gentlemen talk about people down there wanting this bill passed. When men stand on this floor and represent to the House and the country that they know better what the people of Porto Rico want than those people themselves, they are simply aping the men of Great Britain, who, in 1776, claimed that they knew better what the American colonists wanted than the colonists knew themselves.

The people of Porto Rico are against this measure. You have the power to heap this curse upon them against their protests; but if you do so, a good part of its damnation will fall on your heads early in November as surely as you live to see the day of election.

There is no apology for this wrong which you are about to inflict upon those people. It was proper that you should give ten days to those gentlemen across the aisle who are compelled to vote against their honest convictions, who are compelled to misrepresent the people of their districts—it was proper you should give them ten days to prepare their apologies for perpetrating this infamous and outrageous wrong upon the people of that little island.

Why, sir, one gentleman says that those people do not need any market; that they have not anything to sell. That is the way to induce them to raise sugar and coffee and other products—give them a market in which to sell their products. Oxnard said free sugar will take millions of money into that island, build up new industries, and largely increase the production of sugar there. That is just what those people need to lift them out of poverty and distress into prosperity and happiness. Sir, that is what they need. Now, when we on this side appeal to you to put a tax on rum in Porto Rico you shed tears and answer, "No." But when it comes to putting a tax on food and clothing for those poor people, you clap your hands and vote "aye." Away with such sympathy as that! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, the Territorial part of this bill is simply infamous. The executive council, or upper branch of the legislature, is appointed by the President, eleven in number, and six of them may be residents of the United States—I mean outside of Porto Rico. These eleven men appointed by the President have the power to dispose of all the franchises and public privileges in that island, and yet they are in no way responsible to the people of Porto Rico. What a field for bribery and corruption! What an outrage to place all these precious rights and privileges of these people in the hands of such a body!

Mr. Speaker, this provision is sure to breed corruption. It is a public shame to rush such an unjust and vicious bill through this House without debate and without any opportunity for amendment. In this matter the House has completely surrendered to the Senate. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], to be allotted to such gentlemen as he may select.

Mr. MCCALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH].

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to put on record my reasons for not supporting the present measure.

I believe the policy of this bill to be wrong. I believe that it is the desire of my constituents and my plain duty to vote against the measure. Recently I have been in Michigan and have felt the public pulse, and from the Detroit River to the city of Grand Rapids I have hardly found a voter within the limits of my State, of whatever political faith—Republican, Democrat, or Prohibition—who favors this bill.

While in Grand Rapids the State Prohibition convention met, and I had opportunity to talk with many people from all parts of the State. Municipal elections were held while I was in Michigan, and the principal theme of conversation was the Porto Rican bill. And the sentiment is unanimous, or nearly so, against the measure. The people of Michigan are fairly on bended knees, praying that this cup may pass from them. They are not satisfied with any reason so far given for the change of the policy of our party as set forth in the President's message. Indeed, any reasons suggested are not taken by the people to be reasons.

I desire not to be out of harmony with my party, and appreciate fully the responsibility of standing alone in my delegation. At the same time, the thing that God gave every man to distinguish him from all others of the race is his individuality, his personality, his conscientious self-control, and when man loses that individuality, that independence, that moral force, he ceases to be the distinct man whom God created—that likeness of the Divine Maker—and is then the mere shadow and echo of some one else. And while I may be uncomfortable in my association with the members of my party because of the position I have taken, at the same time I shall be comfortable with myself and with the monitor that guides man right on every path of life—my conscience.

For years the people have been taught that the Porto Rican island was the Gem of the Antilles; that this was a most desirable country, a country teeming in wealth, a country that under the hands of American industry could be made to yield rich returns; that it was fairly contiguous to the United States; that naturally it should be a part and parcel of us; that the sugars and coffee and the tropical fruits would in part supply our needs.

But now that this territory has become ours we hear the claims set forth that the country is nearly valueless and the people far removed from civilization. The people can not be made to believe in the truth of these assertions, which history so pointedly contradicts.

The thing to which I object, and which the people find fault with, is the matter of bad faith. The American people are essentially an honest people, and believe in fair dealing, in good faith, in common honesty.

When the Porto Ricans laid down their arms and surrendered their sovereignty, surrendered all that they had, General Miles said to them that they should be a part of us and should have the common rights of common American citizens. While in the law he had no right to bind our country by such a promise, at the same time, in morals and in common right and common justice, that pledge, made to these people as they bowed on bended knees to the Stars and Stripes, by the officer to whom they surrendered, ought to be in good faith carried out. Then, too, this promise has been ratified, as I shall later show.

Secretary of War Root took the same position in his report. The President, in a speech in a Western State early in the fall, suggested free trade between Porto Rico and the United States. These things may have been done as a carrying out of the promise of General Miles or they may have been done to test the public pulse. In either case the people responded with unanimous consent to such policy. Following this, the President embodied in his message, in as strong words as could be fashioned in the English language, the statement that our plain duty toward Porto Rico was free trade. Following this, both in the Senate and in the House, free-trade bills were introduced, the one in the House on January 24. This bill was fixed for hearing for February 9. The night before, without consultation with the members of our party, without authority, so far as I can learn, without reason, so far as the people can see, the policy of the President and the policy of the party, approved by the people, was changed. And a storm of indignation has swept the American heart and the public conscience ever since, a storm that will not be allayed. The American people will not submit to such double dealing.

Right and duty are always majestic ideals. The comfort and the pleasure which come from right action nerve the arm of the warrior, kindle the imagination of the poet, make words to bud and blossom on the lips of the orator, make the priest and the minister eloquent, inspire the toil of the statesman, take the doctor out into the cold and inclement night, soften every defeat, and gild every victory. These things bring man in harmony with the eternal. And the people love goodness and right and justice and fair play.

Our nation is not our possessions, not our battle ships, not our armies, nor our merchant marine, whitening every sea, not our pride, our pomp, our glory, but the thing that distinguishes our nation is the justice of man to man, the justice and the consideration of the Government of the rights of all those who dwell beneath the ample and protecting folds of the flag.

Mr. Speaker, I believe with the great Bismarck that this world is not ruled from below. I believe with him that there is a God of nations and a God of battles that points the victory for the right. I believe that we can trace the finger of God in the rise and fall of nations. At the birth of our Savior the commercial center of the world was in the distant East. Then it passed on to Babylon and Nineveh, and then on to Carthage, and then to Rome, and on to England. And I believe that that great pendulum is now swinging over the United States. "Westward the star of empire takes its way."

And I believe that this is the exalted opportunity of the American Republic and that only the Republican party, which I love, and love to serve, can lead this great nation on to that wonderful attainment. And I believe that in this world the good alone are triumphant. I believe in the survival of the fittest—the survival of the dressmaker; and because I believe that the good alone will triumph I can not bring my conscience to the support of this bill. [Applause.]

The thing, Mr. Speaker, that I can not satisfy, that monitor that guides men aright in every pathway of life, is what I regard as the exercise of bad faith toward this weak people. That is the thing that the people in my district complain mostly about.

When these poor Porto Ricans fell on bended knees before the Stars and Stripes, General Miles, our representative there, made unto them a promise, in substance, that if they would fall down and worship us they should be of us, a part of us, and should have the blessings that come to the citizens of the United States.

I am told, sir, that the promise of General Miles had no legal or binding effect. That may be true, Mr. Speaker, as a question of law; but I believe that when the Commander in Chief of the armies of the United States appointed General Miles to go down there and do battle and accept the surrender of the Porto Ricans, and they fell down in the presence of our flag, and he made unto them a promise of that character, I believe, sir, that in morals and in conscience we ought to carry that pledge into effect. [Applause.]

And for that reason I shall cast my vote against this bill. In doing so I shall enter my protest against this legislation, and if those members of the Democratic side who loudly claim to stand for principle, but who are not in their seats to-day, were present to make good their position as claimed, my protest would be made effective.

The preamble to the Constitution of the United States, the chart by which we sail, provides:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty for ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution.

The aim and the ideal of the fathers was, and the thing they sought to establish was, "A more perfect union," and was to "insure domestic tranquillity."

There can never be that sisterhood of States, that more perfect union, that domestic tranquillity which the fathers sought to insure to posterity, when one State in that sisterhood, one Territory in that sisterhood, one domain in that sisterhood, one colony or one province shall have one kind of taxation and another part have another rate of taxation.

The very bed rock and foundation stone of the Republic is equal rights and equal opportunities to all who dwell beneath the Stars and Stripes.

If Alaska could besiege Congress with argument and lobby for a low tariff, Arizona for a high tariff, and Massachusetts for no tariff, the tendency would be toward a family quarrel and toward a destruction of that harmony, union, sisterhood, and tranquillity sought by the fathers to be established.

I have not changed my thought nor my position concerning this measure. I yielded assent to the House bill with the amendments, for the reasons that the measure was not to be taken as the policy of this nation; that it was to be temporary; that it was to meet a dire and pressing necessity, to relieve a suffering people, polite charity, and because the amount was reduced so as to yield an amount which would meet the actual necessity of these unfortunate people, made unfortunate by storm and flood, and because no better way seemed to be pointed out or known for relieving the distress of the Porto Ricans. I shall speak further of this later on.

But almost immediately upon the passage of the bill a way was found by turning over the revenues already collected from them—more than $2,000,000 in amount. This measure passed both the House and the Senate and received the signature of the President, and the necessity for present relief has passed. It can not be necessary that we at once spend large sums of money to build schools for those who for four hundred years have got along without them. Schools come with the necessity for them. These people do not desire charity. They simply and only desire the equal right to enjoy the equal privileges and bear the equal burdens of the true freeborn American citizen. We have already turned over to them the following sums: $1,000,000 out of emergency fund; $2,095,000 out of tariff on trade with United States; $1,500,000 out of tariff on trade with foreign countries; total, $4,595,000.

I do not feel that I should be criticised for the position I take when men in my party are at liberty to vote against measures, and that without criticism. Men on the committee which has this bill in charge voted against the measure establishing a government in Hawaii, but they are not read out of the party.

I believe I am in harmony with the real, honest sentiments of a large majority of the men of the House. Nearly all of the members will admit that in their judgment the change in the policy of the President was ill advised.

I know I am in harmony with my party outside of the House. The Republicans of Massachusetts, of Michigan, of New York, all gave expression in their platforms to the sentiments I maintain.

Michigan, in her platform, said:

> Providence has made this nation the instrument for the uplifting of the oppressed people of Porto Rico.

New York made this ringing declaration:

> Wherever our flag has gone, there the liberty, the humanity, and the civilization which the flag embodies and represents must remain and abide forever.

And these declarations are not yet two years old.

I have not in any manner changed my position on this question from the beginning until now. I am right where I was in the beginning. I have heard all the arguments, read all I have been able to find on the subject; have heard the arguments of my constituents; have tried to reason the subject out for myself, and in the best of good faith tried to solve the problem in harmony with the views of the committee.

I voted for the House bill with the understanding that it was necessary to give immediate relief, etc., but this measure is not the one I supported. This bill provides for a Territorial government of the island. It is thus far permanent in its character.

It fixes the status of the people of Porto Rico and, in section 7, declares—

> That all inhabitants continuing to reside therein [in Porto Rico] who were Spanish subjects on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then resided in Porto Rico and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be deemed and held to be citizens of Porto Rico, and as such entitled to the protection of the United States.

Then, too, section 5 of the original House bill, which in a large measure induced many to support the bill, is entirely wiped out. The original section reads as follows:

> This act shall be taken and held to be provisional in its purpose, and intended to meet a pressing present need for revenue for the island of Porto Rico, and shall not continue in force after the 1st day of March, 1902.

By the present bill we, as a nation, take a position before the world. We put into solemn enactment, to remain forever staring us in the face, to tie our hands for all the future, the proposition that we may tax certain people under the protecting folds of the flag in a different manner from what we tax other people protected by the same flag.

The measure declares that the people of Porto Rico are not citizens of the United States, but that they are in effect subjects—the adopted children, who shall have the butter spread thinner on their bread by a stepmother of their own choosing; that the old hen may levy a tariff upon the chickens which come home to roost.

Such a policy will forever and ever, like the fabled coat of old, burn deeper and deeper into our national life and character.

This bill puts it upon the statute books, where it may be read of all men, for all the days of coming time, that the General in Command of our armies, appointed by the Commander in Chief of the armies of the Republic, may not have his promises carried out—promises ratified by two years of silence, ratified by the opinion and report of the Secretary of War, ratified by the public speeches of the President, and ratified by the President's message, written in unfading ink, on parchment that will outlast time.

We can not, as a nation, afford to say to the world and to the people of the earth that such promises may be repudiated and are only to be used to stimulate false hopes in the throbbing bosoms of oppressed subjects.

And we are told that the plain duty to give to the Porto Ricans free trade did not mean a present duty, but that we were to do this by and by, at some more convenient season.

I can not bring my judgment and my conscience to the support of such shuffling and bad faith.

To my mind, our obligations are moral, not constitutional. The people of Porto Rico, civilized as well as barbarous, are to be, under the new dispensation, cut off from every benefit supposed to be bestowed by the American system of government.

They are not to be represented in the American Congress. The tariff is a tariff against our own territory. They are left nothing but a dead market. This is the Roman method, "Make a solitude and call it peace." It is simply despotism with no regard for the rights of man.

The bill ignores the great principle that government is for the benefit of the governed. This is a time for candor.

General Miles, when first landing American forces on the island, promised the Porto Ricans that they should enjoy the same rights and privileges and immunities as the people of the United States.

With this understanding did the Porto Ricans accept American sovereignty not only without opposition, but with joyful trust and confidence.

This great Republic can not afford to break faith with the little island of Porto Rico. If we break the pledge of General Miles, we ought to give up the fruit which called forth that promise.

The people are therefore opposed to this measure, and the national heart and the national conscience has been stirred to the deepest depths.

There is nothing in the language of the Constitution, in my judgment, which makes the bill unconstitutional.

I believe that the power of Congress over all territory outside the boundary lines of the States is coextensive with the power of the English Parliament.

The power to govern such territory is found, necessarily, under our system somewhere. It certainly has not been reserved to the States. The jurisdiction of a State is confined strictly to its own territory.

But this act violates the common law of England and America, which requires that taxation shall be uniform.

This is not a new question. The old stamp act and the duties on tea of George III and his Parliament are in point.

Every single argument that can be made in favor of the Porto Rico bill was advanced in favor of those acts. We all know how they were regarded in this country—what Adams, Otis, and Jefferson thought of them.

A certain cargo of tea was thrown into Boston Harbor. Is there any particular reason why another cargo should not be dumped into the Gulf of Mexico?

In my judgment, the Republican party can not afford to follow the example of George III now or hereafter.

I am an expansionist, but I am unconditionally in favor of treating the inhabitants of all our territories, at home and abroad, with simple justice. Equality is equity, and equality is the soul of liberty.

The question involved is not protection, but equal taxation. Abraham Lincoln freed 4,000,000 physical slaves. Are we going to emulate this example in the islands of the sea, or are we, for the sake of selfish interest, and in spite of the pledge of the President, going to fasten commercial slavery upon them?

The provision of our Constitution—"The taxes, duties, and imposts shall be uniform throughout the United States"—was placed there for a purpose, and the purpose was to insure the absolute equality and sisterhood of the States.

The framers of the Constitution saw with prophetic vision that the differing soil, climate, waterways, and circumstances of one part might naturally lead to the advantage of one part and the disadvantage to another, of our great domain. That it would breed rivalry, strife, and discontent; that one part would become more valuable and influential than another.

That the money gathered from tariff might be more beneficial and useful to one portion of the country than another, as the pensions are now paid largely in the North.

To prevent this strife and turmoil and contest, and that we might really become one family—a sisterhood of States—it was determined in the beginning that no State should be discriminated against or in favor of, as concerning duties and imposts.

This bill is taxation without representation. It is idle and childlike that we should gather money from them, turn it over to them, expend it for them and for their advancement, instead of permitting them to raise the money themselves, for themselves, and expend it as they see fit.

In this land of equity and equality it can not be right that they should be taxed without having any voice as to the method of taxation or the use that shall be made of the money.

To my mind the amount of the taxes cuts little figure. King George III offered to strike from the stamp act all but the title. He only required that the colonists should recognize the principle that they were slaves and not free—that the King was the master and they were to serve.

The advocates of this bill seem to be the King George of this century. Willing to accept any amount so that the principle may be saved; that it may be established; that different taxation may obtain in one territory from that of another.

I oppose the bill for the reason, among others, that I have not been shown one reason why the policy of the President has been changed.

To my inquiries has come back the answer that it is the measure of the committee, the policy of the party, approved by the leaders and approved by the President. Those who claim a change has been made either can not or will not state the reason therefor.

If the reason can not be stated, then none exists. If the reason will not be stated, then the reason therefor is open to suspicion. It is little comfort to know that the original bill was drawn after a consultation with the President and with officers of the Cabinet. Why not state frankly, freely, and fully that the President did or did not authorize the original bill?

There is no comfort or convincing force in the statement that the original bill was drawn after consultation with a Cabinet officer, or an intimation that it was drawn by him. If the bill was drawn by a member of the Cabinet, why conceal the fact?

Does the cheek of the author of the bill mantle with shame when the parentage thereof is inquired into?

I am neither convinced nor helped by the secrecy attending the birth and growth of the measure thus far.

The original bill was early introduced and full opportunity given for consideration. No fault was to be found therewith.

Then all at once, and without warning or the knowledge of the members, this new change was brought to the light of day. We were taken around behind the hillside and told that the President now desired that this policy should go through.

Referring again to the stamp act, Hansard's Parliamentary History shows that—

When the British Parliament passed the stamp act in 1763 to tax the colonies it bred an instant storm because it was taxation without representation. The Americans not only refused to pay it, but they proceeded to mob every one of the imperialists of those times who had the temerity to speak a good word for the tax. Franklin went to England and served notice upon the ministry that the colonies would cheerfully meet any public burden that fell to their share in maintaining the British sovereignty, provided they were allowed to levy their own taxes, but that the stamp tax or any other based upon a similar principle they would not pay. After he had preached the doctrine of no taxation without representation for fourteen months in England, the public agitation grew so great, even in Great Britain, that Parliament was forced to take cognisance of it. Franklin was called before the House of Commons January 28, 1766, and examined at great length. The following extracts from the proceedings are sufficient to reveal the parallel:

WHAT FRANKLIN SAID.

"Don't you know that the money arising from the stamps was all to be laid out in America?" Franklin was asked.

"I know it is appropriated by the act to the American service."

"Do you think it right that America should be protected by this country and pay no part of the expense?"

"That is not the case. The colonies raised, clothed, and paid, during the last war, near 25,000 men, and spent many millions."

"Do you think the people of America would submit to pay the stamp duty if it was moderated?"

"No, never, unless compelled by force of arms."

"What was the temper of America toward Great Britain before the year 1763?"

"The best in the world. They submitted willingly to the government of the Crown, and paid, in all their courts, obedience to all the acts of Parliament. They were governed by this country at the expense only of a little pen, ink, and paper. They were led by a thread. They had not only a respect but an affection for Great Britain, for its laws, its customs, its manners, and even a fondness for its fashions that greatly increased the commerce. Natives of Great Britain were always treated with particular regard; to be an Old England man was of itself a character of some respect and gave a kind of rank among us."

"And what is their temper now?"

"Oh, very much altered."

"In what light did the people use to consider the Parliament of Great Britain?"

"They considered the Parliament as the great bulwark and security of their liberties and privileges and always spoke of it with the utmost respect and veneration."

"And have they not still the same respect for Parliament?"

"No; it is greatly lessened."

"To what causes is that owing?"

"To a concurrence of causes; the restraints lately laid on their trade, by which the bringing of foreign gold and silver into the colonies was prevented; the prohibition of making paper money among themselves, and then to demand a new and heavy tax by stamps, taking away at the same time trials by jury and refusing to receive and hear their humble petitions."

"Don't you think they would submit to the stamp act if it was modified, the obnoxious parts taken out, and the duty reduced to some particulars of small moment?"

"No; they will never submit to it."

"Have you not heard of the resolution of this House and the House of Lords asserting the right of Parliament relating to America, including a power to tax the people there?"

"Yes; I have heard of such resolutions."

"What will be the opinion of the Americans on those resolutions?"

"They will think them unconstitutional and unjust."

"Considering the resolutions as to the right, do you think, if the stamp act is repealed, that the North Americans will be satisfied?"

"I believe they will."

"Why do you think so?"

"I think the resolutions of right will give them very little concern if they are never attempted to be carried into practice. The colonies will probably consider themselves in the same situation in that respect with Ireland. They know you claim the same right with regard to Ireland, but you never exercise it. And they may believe you never will exercise it in the colonies any more than in Ireland unless on some very extraordinary occasion."

WANT REPRESENTATION.

"But who are to be the judges of that very extraordinary occasion? Is not the Parliament?"

"Though the Parliament may be judge of the occasion, the people will think it can never exercise such right till representatives from the colonies are admitted into Parliament, and that whenever that occasion arises representatives will be ordered."

"If the act is not repealed, what do you think will be the consequences?"

"A total loss of the respect and affection the people of America bear to this country, and of all the commerce that depends on that respect and affection."

"How can the commerce be affected?"

"You will find that if the act is not repealed they will take very little of your manufactures in a short time."

"Is it in their power to do without them?"

"I think they may very well do without them. The people have already struck off, by general agreement, the use of all goods fashionable in mournings, and many thousand pounds' worth are sent back as unsalable."

"Supposing the stamp act continued and enforced, do you imagine that ill humor will induce the Americans to give as much for worse manufactures of their own and use them preferably to better of ours?"

"Yes; I think so. People will pay as freely to gratify one passion as another, their resentment as their pride."

"Would they suffer the produce of their lands to rot?"

"No; but they would not raise so much. They would manufacture more and plow less."

"Would it be most for the interest of Great Britain to employ the hands of Virginia in tobacco or in manufactures?"

"In tobacco, to be sure."

"What need to be the pride of the Americans?"

"To indulge in the fashions and manufactures of Great Britain."

"What is now their pride?"

"To wear their old clothes over again till they can make new ones."

THE KING'S RIGHT.

The "resolution of right" which was adopted when the stamp act was repealed shortly after Franklin's hearing is as follows:

"That the King's Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal and the Commons of Great Britain in Parliament assembled, had, hath, and of right ought to have, full power to make laws and statutes of sufficient force and validity to bind the colonies and people of America, subjects of the Crown of Great Britain, in all cases whatsoever."

We all know the foregoing is an accurate picture of what this nation may expect if the course proposed is carried out toward Porto Rico. To my mind the parallel is complete.

I have no purpose in what I have said to reflect in any manner upon my party, the party I love and love to serve—the party that was born in purity and in purity and justice has continued.

I have no wish to place myself with the party of negation, and the party which has no love for its ancestors and no hope of posterity.

Let us call the roll of our immortals: Lincoln, that almost more than human man; Grant, the silent warrior, the safe statesman, who made the circuit of the world, and was honored everywhere.

Hayes, of Ohio, whose public service was without a blemish or a scandal.

Garfield, who went from the towpath to the Presidential chair.

Arthur, a just, true patriot.

Harrison, of Indiana, under whose rule this nation attained its highest measure of progress, and William McKinley, who fought with Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley, to-day the foremost man in all the world.

Grover Cleveland, the only President of the Democracy since I have been on earth, is never mentioned by his party save in scorn and derision, and yet in the annals of time his deedswill shine in unfading glory when his traducers shall sleep in unremembered graves.

Stephen A. Douglas, the Little Giant, the foremost man of his party since my remembrance, has been by you forgotten, and yet to the rest of the world he was a wonderful man.

After all the debates and the strife and the contention with Lincoln, when the election was over and Lincoln was President, and the flag was fired upon and the nation was in peril, Douglas, in heroic grandeur, rising to exalted heights, forsook his party, and forgetting party fealty, party pride, and party hatred, forgetting Lincoln the man, and remembering Lincoln the President, went to him and held up his hands, and stood only for the common country and the common flag.

Wonderful patriotism, wonderful sacrifice. And when Lincoln, before the Capitol of the nation, took the oath of his high office, Stephen A. Douglas, as an humble citizen, was willing to and did hold his hat.

In the record of the eternities the name of Lincoln and the name of Douglas will be written side by side in lines of unfading glory.

Douglas the patriot, and Lincoln the greatest American. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, the history and manipulation of the question we are now considering is certainly peculiar, and its final decision will produce greater results than many may now anticipate. That we should give it careful consideration and act on our own honest, unbiased judgment, keeping in mind the wishes of our constituents, whose will it is our duty to execute, can hardly be doubted.

It is only a short time since our honored and trusted Chief Executive, in his message to the two Houses of Congress, tersely stated it to be our "plain duty" to abolish all custom tariffs between the United States and Porto Rico, and to give her free access to our markets. In so stating he so certainly voiced the unanimous sentiment of our people that not one word was pronounced, written, or printed in our whole great country criticising or objecting to his position, and all the people, regardless of party, relied upon his implied promise and were pleased.

Later, on the 19th day of last January, the esteemed chairman of our Committee on Ways and Means in this House introduced a bill to extend our laws relating to customs and internal revenue over the island of Porto Rico, proposing to carry into effect, by legislative enactment, the recommendation of our President.

That bill was referred to that important committee. Not one word was heard in this body against it, because it embodied the American idea and a principle and practice of our Government from its foundation down to this day. It was not considered by anyone a partisan measure, and it was confidently expected that it would be favorably reported and as unanimously passed as was, two years ago, the bill placing in the hands of our great President $50,000,000 to be expended by him in his discretion.

No one doubted the wisdom of our President or the propriety of the bill, and we all confidently waited and anticipated the reporting and passing of the bill as a matter of course.

The idea had never entered the American mind that a tariff might, or should be, imposed upon the commerce and trade between different parts of our common country, however acquired or by whatever name known. No one suspected it possible that Congress would even consider the question as to whether we should deny the peaceable, law-abiding people of this, our new, acquisition all the commercial rights and privileges we had in the past universally conceded our newly acquired domain.

All, regardless of party, approved the sentiment expressed by the President and the policy indicated by the bill, and there was a feeling of satisfaction throughout the land. There was not a cloud above the horizon, when, without warning, like a clap of thunder out of a clear sky, from the same source came a bill, the foundation and a part of the one we are now considering, diametrically opposed to the recommendation of the President, to the bill first introduced, and to the will of the people.

At first the people were astounded. They could not understand. They could and did understand the meaning and object of this new bill, but they could not and do not understand how and why the two bills could come from the same source and within so short a time; they could not and do not understand how it could be introduced and recommended in the light of the principles and traditions of our country, the universal approval of the President's message, and the love of our whole people for justice and the equal rights of all under our flag in life, liberty, and property. It will not be wise for us to hide our heads within these walls and claim that the people are ignorant and do not understand the question; that we must educate them. They do understand it, and if we do not do our duty and listen to them they may educate us. We are here simply as the agents and servants of the people who sent us here, and we should obey their instructions and wishes. We should not be guilty of a breach of trust or of larceny as bailees.

I respectfully submit that every argument first used in support of the tariff provisions of this bill was fallacious or has since been contradicted by the gentlemen who urged it. At first an attempt was made to muddy the water by a learned discussion of the proposition that the proposed legislation was not absolutely prohibited by the Constitution, as though this body could not do what was right unless absolutely compelled so to do by the Constitution, and that our power alone was sufficient reason for the proposed action. No one has questioned or can question that under the Constitution we have ample power to accord Porto Rico the same access to the markets of the States, not only for the purpose of purchasing but for the purpose of selling, that has never been gainsaid any other territory under our flag; and with equal propriety we might say that that authority compels us to open our markets to Porto Rico.

Again, it was urged that it was absolutely necessary for us to pass this tariff feature and turn its proceeds, under the direction of the President, over to that Territory in order to prevent the necessity of appropriating money out of the Treasury to meet its public needs. Almost immediately more than $2,000,000 were appropriated out of the Treasury for that purpose, more than enough to meet the public requirements of the people of that island for the coming two years, and that argument was destroyed.

Next, it was claimed that there was a difference of opinion as to whether under the Constitution the proposed tariff could be lawfully imposed, and that in order that the question might be speedily brought before the Supreme Court and authoritatively settled, it was necessary that the bill be passed, the collection of the tariff resisted and enjoined, and a case made. To expedite the decision of that question parties in New York City contracted in Porto Rico with a native of that island to perform for them labor in New York and brought him there under contract, and he was arrested, with the statement that he was to be deported.

The New York parties commenced habeas corpus proceedings under the claim that the Constitution extended to Porto Rico; that the Porto Rican was a citizen of the United States, and that in consequence thereof the foreign contract-labor law was not being violated. Habeas corpus proceedings have the right of way, and it seemed that the alleged purpose of the supporters of the tariff feature of this bill would be immediately accomplished when the Secretary of the Treasury caused the question to be dodged by ordering the release of the prisoner, and that argument went out of the window. The Secretary's avowed reasons for his action will hardly satisfy anyone who really wants the question promptly, judicially settled.

The public necessities of the Porto Ricans being now amply provided for during the proposed life of this proposed tariff, and its friends declining to let the constitutional question speedily come before the courts, I can not see the shadow of an excuse for the imposition of the tariff. Our revenues are now exceeding our expenditures. A surplus is being accumulated in the Treasury, and under existing law this proposed additional tariff or tax is not required for any purpose. The reasons assigned in the preamble to the original bill passed by this House being fallacious, if not unfounded, the Senate amended the bill by striking it out; and our Committee on Ways and Means admits the correctness of this decision by recommending the passage of the bill as amended by the Senate.

The Senate has weighted the bill with a civil government amendment and has made other amendments, seeking to sugar coat the objectionable tariff provisions, but making, in my judgment, the present bill, in principle, more objectionable than when it left the House. As it left us it proposed to impose a tariff upon products shipped by us to Porto Rico as well as upon products shipped by the Porto Ricans to us. As it comes back it proposes to allow us to ship and sell most of our products to Porto Rico free of duty, but to compel them to pay for the privilege of shipping and selling their products to us.

This, I submit, is not reciprocity or common fairness. It is an unjust discrimination in favor of the rich and strong against the poor and weak, and it is unworthy of our great Republic. It is proposed to impose this tariff simply because, in the opinion of some, we are not prevented by the Constitution and have the power to do so. By taking possession of Porto Rico we have deprived it of markets it otherwise would have retained and have only half opened to it the doors of our own. If our positions were reversed, and Porto Rico were the power and we the dependent, and she should attempt to force upon us such an unjust enactment, the spirit of 1776 would assert itself and there would be a righteous revolution. That Porto Rico is too poor and weak to resist is no excuse for our proposed action.

The amount or duration of the proposed tariff is not the controlling question, but the principle is what we should consider and allow to govern us.

It is not a question of expediency, but of honor.

The fact that this bill limits the duration of the proposed tariff is an admission by its framers that in principle and practice it is wrong.

The action of the Senate, acquiesced in by the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, in making the tariff merely nominal, to remain in force only a short time, is an admission that it is unjustifiable. And, in view of the $2,000,000 appropriation, will it not be unwise for us to enact this unnecessary legislation, indorse this new policy, and establish this dangerous precedent?

For years I have been in favor of reciprocity with Cuba and Porto Rico; for years I have been in favor of and advocated their honorable admission as Territories, on the ground that their admission would be to the benefit of themselves and us. I have so favored because we should have them as free markets for our manufactures and farm products, which they use and consume, but do not produce, and we should be able to obtain free of duty their sugar, coffee, fruits, etc., consumed, but not produced by us; because their annexation would enable our mechanics and farmers to get a better price for their products and our people to obtain the products of those islands for a less sum, never for a moment suspecting it possible that a tariff tax would be even suggested between any parts of our common country. A Republican, I have always been in favor of reciprocity with foreign countries, and can not now vote to refuse reciprocity with a part of our own.

The proposed measure, I submit, is a dangerous departure from the lifelong policy of the United States; and if it is adopted, we are in the air, and no one can tell what the result will be. If this measure be adopted, no people can safely become a part of us, as they can have no assurance of their status or treatment. We may as well write upon the walls of our borders, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here."

If we made a mistake in passing the tariff feature of this bill, we should correct it at the earliest possible moment.

With due respect for the opinion of those from whom I differ, in my judgment, this House made a mistake in passing the tariff feature of this bill, and now having the opportunity, it should correct that mistake. In my judgment, it is un-Republican; and as a Republican I will vote against it in whatever shape or company it is submitted. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to devote the time at my command to the discussion of the proposition to impose tariff duties upon the trade between the States and Porto Rico. I had intended to remain silent upon the question and content myself with voting against it, but it has assumed such an aspect that I am impelled to express my views in explanation of my action.

At the outset I deny that the Republican party is committed to the policy of erecting tariff barriers between the States and the newly acquired Spanish islands. As a Republican I have always been an ardent defender of the principles of that great party, and as one of its representatives in this body, I am bound by its traditions and the pledges contained in its national platforms. But I recognize in the delegates assembled in a national convention the only authority to establish a new policy for that party.

Every Republican on the floor of this House owes it to himself and his party to cooperate with the President upon all questions as far as he can consistently do so. This is a Republican Administration, and it should have the entire sympathy of every member of that party and the cooperation of all occupying official responsibilities. Differences of opinion may exist respecting matters of detail and expediency, but I realize the fact that concessions must be made and disagreements be adjusted in order that the majority may carry out in any degree the just expectations of the country. Even in matters of vital importance, involving great questions of principle, those of a minority view should always analyze their footing deliberately and carefully before determining upon a steadfast resistance, lest they be wrong. It is an embarrassing position, indeed, for one to find himself unable to agree with the large majority of his party associates in this body upon even a single question.

But, sir, the question under consideration is one of vital importance. It affects the very character of our institutions and determines the destiny of millions of people who have been fortuitously placed under our control. I have given the question the maturest thought of which I have been capable, and I am of the profound conviction that the measure is wrong in principle. Besides, I am convinced that an overwhelming majority of the people of the district that I have the honor to represent—Republicans as well as Democrats—are intelligently in opposition to the measure. The question, then, for me to decide is, Shall I act in accordance with my own convictions and in harmony with the sentiment of my constituents or shall I suppress my judgment, turn my back upon the people who repose their trust in me, and vote according to the suggestion of gentlemen from other States? There seems to me but one course for me to pursue, and that is to obey my constituents and my conscience.

When and how did the Porto Rican tariff measure become a party question? The President, for whom I have the highest regard in every respect, in his annual message to Congress on the 4th day of last December, unequivocally and emphatically recommended absolute free trade between the States and Porto Rico as a matter of "plain duty." This is what he said:

> Since the cession Porto Rico has been denied the principal markets she had long enjoyed, and our tariffs have been continued against her products as when she was under Spanish sovereignty. The markets of Spain are closed to her products except upon terms to which the commerce of all nations is subjected. The island of Cuba, which used to buy her cattle and tobacco without customs duties, now imposes the same duties upon these products as from any other country entering her ports. She has, therefore, lost her free intercourse with Spain and Cuba, without any compensating benefits in this market. Her coffee was little known and not in use by our people, and therefore there was no demand here for this, one of her chief products. The markets of the United States should be opened up to her products. Our plain duty is to abolish all customs tariffs between the United States and Porto Rico, and give her products free access to our markets.

There is no mistaking that recommendation.

Then the Secretary of War, in his last annual report, made the same recommendation in terms of equal clearness and force. He said:

> The highest considerations of justice and good faith demand that we should not disappoint the confident expectations of sharing in our prosperity with which the people of Porto Rico so gladly transferred their allegiance to the United States. We should treat the interests of this people as our own. I wish most strongly to urge that the customs duties between Porto Rico and the United States be removed.

General Davis, the military governor of the island, who is better acquainted with its situation than any other American, has repeatedly and persistently recommended the same policy. In compliance with these recommendations, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, the honored and respected leader of the Republican side, on the 19th day of January, 1900, introduced a bill providing for free trade with Porto Rico, and that measure met with the favor of every member of the House, as far as I was able to judge, and of the entire country. On the 8th day of February following the same honored chairman of the Ways and Means Committee reported a tariff bill in direct opposition to the President's recommendations and his own original measure. Let me ask, Was free trade with Porto Rico the policy of the Republican party from the 1st of December, 1899, until the 8th day of February, 1900? Then did we reverse that policy and start in the opposite direction? I have said this much in the way of introductory observation to illustrate that it is the duty of every member of this House to feel the utmost freedom of thought and action upon the great question which I shall now briefly discuss.

THE CONSTITUTION.

The bill as it now stands provides for a very moderate tariff upon certain articles imported from Porto Rico into the States and a like tariff upon a limited number of articles from the States into Porto Rico. It is to be temporary in its operation and the revenues are all to be turned into the insular treasury to be used in maintaining the government. The bill was originally urged in the House as an emergency measure to provide ready money for the relief of the inhabitants of the island, but subsequently a bill was passed turning over to the Porto Ricans about two and a half million dollars—more than the tariff bill would yield during its entire lifetime—so the emergency argument no longer exists. If it shall be the policy of this Government to impose tariff restrictions upon Porto Rican trade, the bill can not be regarded as a burdensome one.

But sir, in my opinion, the bill violates the Federal Constitution and contravenes the policy that this Government has maintained ever since its existence. It involves a principle that is at war with free institutions and repugnant to the genius of Republican government. It is an innocent-looking measure on its face, I confess, but it foreshadows a policy of colonialism against which this Government has been a standing reproach during the entire period of its national life. If we have the right to impose this tariff against Porto Rico, it follows, as a necessary logical sequence, that we have the arbitrary power to impose tariff duties against all of our insular possessions, and all the Territories, without limitation or restriction. This is exactly the position taken in his very able speech on the floor of this House on the 19th of February last by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. It is the position to which the logic of the tariff measure irresistibly leads. The tariff advocates contend that the Federal Constitution does not apply to Porto Rico nor the Territories, and that Congress may legislate for them without any regard whatever to the limitations which that instrument places upon its powers.

I maintain that Congress is bound by the limitations in the Constitution in making laws wherever they may operate. I am one who believes that the Constitution extends to the island of Porto Rico by its own force, provided I be allowed to define what is meant by the extension of the Constitution. I understand by that term that the Constitution operates to restrain and limit the powers of Congress in Porto Rico the same as in New Mexico. Congress must govern the islands through the Constitution. Wherever the Congressional authority goes, the Constitution goes to limit and restrain its exercise. The Constitution applies to Congress whenever and wherever it acts, and therefore it applies to every foot of territory over which Congress has authority. Congressional authority goes limited and hampered by the Constitution. If Congress should attempt to pass a law abridging the freedom of speech in Porto Rico, the Constitution would forbid it.

Wherever the Congressional power is extended in theory the Constitution is extended. Suppose Congress should attempt to pass a law for Porto Rico upon any subject respecting which its power is denied, any inhabitant of the island could question the validity of the act. He could go into a court of competent jurisdiction and invoke the power of the Constitution in his protection, against the enforcement of the law. The court would construe and apply the Constitution to determine whether Congress possessed the disputed power, and if it did not would hold the law invalid. Does not the Constitution extend there, then? Congress has no powers except those granted by the Constitution, and in extending its authority can it carry any powers that it does not possess? It can not carry any more because it does not have them. The Constitution must be resorted to to define the powers of Congress wherever they are exercised. This is what I understand by extending the Constitution.

This is a constitutional government in the sense that its powers are defined by a written charter against the provisions of which Congress has no authority to act. All sovereignty primarily is in the people, and they conferred upon the Federal Government only such functions of sovereignty as they desired to have it exercise. All of the residue of power was reserved to the States and to the people, where they abide now. The tenth amendment declares:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Additional powers may be given Congress by amending the Constitution, and in no other way. Congress does not possess a single power except those granted by that instrument, and those it must exercise under the conditions and limitations therein imposed, without regard to time, place, or circumstance. I challenge gentlemen to point to a single decision of a court in the entire country that controverts that proposition. It lies at the foundation of all our jurisprudence and is interwoven into every phase of our political life.

Now, sir, what is meant by the annexation of territory? Why, simply extending the sovereignty of the Republic over it. What is sovereignty? The power to govern. Then the annexation of territory means the extension of our power of government over it. That power resides in the Federal Constitution and annexation means bringing territory within the purview of the Constitution. That proposition is axiomatic. It results from the nature of the Government itself. With all due respect to the opinions of distinguished gentlemen to the contrary, it seems absurd that Congress, the creature of the Constitution, can go where the charter creating it is forbidden.

I will not weary the patience of the House by quoting from decisions of courts upon this question, but will content myself with the statement that not a decision of any court of respectable standing in the country can be produced holding that Congress can govern the Territories without regard to the Constitution. I challenge the production of any such decision. On the other hand, I can name a dozen decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States holding, either expressly or by necessary implication, that Congress is bound by the fundamental limitations of the Constitution in legislating for the Territories as well as the States.

And, sir, every foot of land under the flag, whether in a State or Territory, has been governed under the Constitution. Never during the one hundred and twelve years of our national life has Congress passed laws for the government of Territories, organized or unorganized, that denied the inhabitants any of the fundamental rights of person or property guaranteed by the Constitution. I do not forget the resolution of 1803 for the government of Louisiana. That Territory was being governed by the President under the war power, the same as Porto Rico is being governed to-day, and the resolutions passed by Congress conferring absolute power upon the President were utterly without significance.

The President already had full power and those resolutions did not add to nor detract from it an iota. If we should pass a similar resolution respecting the government of Porto Rico, it would not confer upon the President any additional power. It would be in effect only a vote of confidence. If any other apparent exceptions be found, it will be discovered on analysis that they were temporary only and more fully establish the rule. I repeat, sir, that Congress has never enacted any laws for the government of Territories in violation of the Federal Constitution.

I am aware that views have been expressed by eminent statesmen upon both sides of this question, but when Congress came to act it was always on one side, and when the courts came to decide the decisions were all one way. In one instance where territory had been annexed we treated it temporarily as foreign territory for the purposes of taxation, but that was justified on the ground that it was under the control of the President, and Congress had enacted no revenue laws applicable to it, but that does not prove that the Constitution did not apply to the territory.

I have demonstrated that the Constitution applies to territory as soon as annexation is consummated, but it does not execute itself. Governmental machinery must be organized for its enforcement. The President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, may, in the exercise of his war power, govern without regard to the restrictions imposed upon Congressional action, but his government is of necessity, and is supposed to be temporary only. Whenever Congress takes control it must act within the Constitution. During the civil war the governmental machinery was overthrown in the insurrectionary States. There were no courts to enforce rights of person and property, but it will not be claimed that the Constitution did not apply to those States during that period. So with newly acquired territory the Constitution extends, but its provisions can not be enforced until Congress by necessary legislation supplies the machinery for that purpose.

But we hear it said that the island of Porto Rico is not part of the United States and will not be until Congress makes it such by proper legislation. If it is not part of the United States, by what authority do we assume to govern it? Our laws have no extraterritorial force. They can not be enforced in foreign countries. But Porto Rico is part of the United States. It was annexed by the Paris treaty, and our sovereignty was extended over it, and no other governmental act is necessary to consummate the annexation.

CONGRESSIONAL EXTENSION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Can Congress extend the Constitution to Porto Rico? Did Congress create the Constitution or did the Constitution create Congress? If we can extend the Constitution by a simple legislative act, we can withdraw it by repealing the act. Can we play shuttlecock with the Constitution in this ridiculous fashion? If we can extend the Constitution by an act of Congress, it could only have the force of a Federal statute, and a subsequent act in conflict with its provisions would repeal it pro tanto. In this connection I quote from a letter written by ex-Senator George F. Edmunds on the 21st ultimo to Hon. REDFIELD PROCTOR:

But the Constitution, as such, I suppose all admit, is not subject to the control of Congress, either to enlarge or diminish, to expand or contract, or to be applied to or withdrawn from any people or place. It is not a movable thing, like the Ark of the Covenant of the Israelites, to be set up and moved here or there, as the tribes might wander. It is the actual event and condition, and not the legislative or executive will, that must, in the nature of things, determine the status of a man or a country under it.

Neither can the question be affected by the terms of a treaty. A treaty has no superiority over an act of Congress. They are of equal dignity, and a statute subsequent to a treaty may repeal it in whole or in part. Who ever heard of an act of Congress being held void because it was in conflict with the terms of a treaty? The suggestion that a treaty is of equal dignity with the Constitution needs no other refutation than the statement carries on its face. If that were correct, the entire character of the Government could be changed by the treaty-making power. Constitutional government for the Territories as well as the States has been our unbroken policy ever since we have had a policy, and, in my humble opinion, it will continue to be as long as the love of liberty finds an abiding place in the hearts of the people.

I believe in the sentiment expressed by President McKinley last August at Ocean Grove, that the flag means the same thing in Porto Rico as it means here. It means constitutional liberty to all within its folds here, and it means the same thing wherever it floats as the emblem of American sovereignty. I can not believe, sir, that its field of azure blue and its stripes of crimson red fade into a colorless rag under the blaze of a tropical sun. Those colors are as firm and steadfast as the loyalty and devotion of the host of American heroes who gave up their lives in defense of the eternal truths they represent.

WEBSTER AND CALHOUN.

The great fame of Daniel Webster is drawn upon to support the doctrine that the Constitution does not extend to the Territories. I know, sir, that in a debate with Mr. Calhoun, in 1849, Mr. Webster declared that the Constitution did not apply to the Territories, and he said furthermore that it could not be extended by an act of Congress. Mr. Webster took the position that if the Constitution applied to the Territories, they would be entitled to republican forms of government, to representatives in both branches of Congress and in the electoral college—in short, they would be States. With that explanation of what he meant by the extension of the Constitution, his position was correct then and is correct now.

But we have had fifty years of national life and growth since his utterance, and we now see with a clear vision how admirably the Constitution is adapted to both State and Territorial political conditions. We have discovered that the Federal Constitution confers no political privileges, but they all come from statehood, and it may cover the Territories without making States of them. But the great Webster was not an advocate of the doctrine of arbitrary government. He never claimed that Congress could pass laws for the Territories in violation of the express provisions of the Constitution. On the 23d day of March, 1848, in an exceptionally well prepared speech in the Senate, he said:

An arbitrary government may have territorial governments in distant possessions, because an arbitrary government may rule its distant territories by different laws and different systems. Russia may govern the Ukraine and the Caucasus and Kamchatka by different codes or ukases. We can do no such thing. They must be of us—part of us—or else estranged. I think I see, then, in progress what is to disfigure and deform the Constitution. * * * I think I see a course adopted that is likely to turn the Constitution under which we live into a deformed monster—into a curse rather than a blessing—into a great frame of unequal government, not founded on popular representation, but founded in the grossest inequalities; and I think if it go on, for there is a great danger that it will go on, that this Government will be broken up.

That language is unmistakable. Are gentlemen who quote him on the other side of the question willing to accept that doctrine? The statement has been made and repeated that the doctrine of the extension of the Constitution was first advanced by Mr. Calhoun in 1849, for the purpose of carrying slavery into the Territories. I am aware that that was Mr. Benton's contention, and in his personal bitterness toward Mr. Calhoun he characterized it as "a vagary of a diseased imagination."

But that is a perversion of history. In the year 1820 John Marshall, as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in a judicial opinion in which all of his associates concurred, declared that the Constitution extended to the Territories as well as the States. He gave expression to that opinion not as a politician or lawyer, but as the spokesman of that court whose reputation owes so much to his high character and ability. It was the Supreme Court of the United States, through its most illustrious chief, that made part of the imperishable history of the country the doctrine of the inseparability of the flag and the Constitution, thirty years before the debate between Calhoun and Webster.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY AND THE CONSTITUTION.

The Republican party came into existence as the champion of the theory that the Constitution extended to the Territories. The Democrats at that time, under the leadership of Mr. Douglas, advocated the doctrine of "squatter sovereignty"—that the people of a Territory might establish slavery during the probationary period, and on admission to statehood the question should be finally determined whether the State should be free or slave.

The Republicans denied the right in Congress or the people of the Territory to establish slavery. They predicated their position upon the doctrine that the Constitution applied to the Territories, and the guaranties of life, liberty, and property made slavery an impossibility in the Territories. The whole philosophy of Republicanism was predicated upon the supreme and controlling character of the Constitution in the Territories. I will read one resolution contained in the platform of the Republican party in 1856:

Resolved, That with our republican fathers we hold it to be a self-evident truth that all men are endowed with the inalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that the primary object and ulterior design of our Federal Government were to secure these rights to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction; that as our republican fathers, when they had abolished slavery in all our national territory, ordained that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, it becomes our duty to maintain this provision of the Constitution against all attempts to violate it for the purpose of establishing slavery in any Territory of the United States by positive legislation prohibiting its existence or extension therein. That we deny the authority of Congress, of a Territorial legislature, of any individual or association of individuals, to give legal existence to slavery in any Territory of the United States while the present Constitution shall be maintained.

No slavery in the Territories "while the present Constitution shall be maintained!" That was the Republican doctrine of John C. Fremont. The Constitution was then standing guard over the liberties of the people in the Territories.

In 1858 the Dred Scott decision announced the startling doctrine that the Constitution recognized slave property, and under its ægis the owner of slaves had the same right to take them into the Territories as he had to take any other kind of property, and his slaves were entitled to the same protection as other property.

Every judge in the court concurred in the view that the Constitution applied to the Territories, but the minority maintained that it did not recognize or create property in slaves. The opinion of Judge Curtis became the doctrine of the Republican party in the historical campaign of 1860. That was that slavery was a municipal institution created and fostered by State law only. They claimed that the Federal Constitution neither created nor recognized slaves, but, on the other hand, it covered the Territories and prohibited slavery in them. The Republican platform of 1860 contained these significant resolutions:

7. That the new dogma that the Constitution, of its own force, carries slavery into any or all of the Territories of the United States is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with explicit provisions of the instrument itself, with contemporaneous exposition, and with legislative and judicial precedent, is revolutionary in its tendency, and subversive of the peace and harmony of the country.

8. That the normal condition of all the territory of the United States is that of freedom; that as our republican fathers, when they had abolished slavery in all our national territory, ordained that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," it becomes our duty by legislation, whenever such legislation is necessary, to maintain this provision of the Constitution against all attempts to violate it; and we deny the authority of Congress, of a Territorial legislature, or of any individuals to give legal existence to slavery in any Territory of the United States.

A substantial reiteration of the theory of the party of 1856. They again asserted that the Constitution, like a guardian angel of liberty, extended over the Territories and made them free even against their own inhabitants and the entire Congress combined. That was the doctrine of the great emancipator and his compeers in the cause of freedom. Will some gentleman please tell me when the Republican party turned its back upon the doctrine of Fremont and of Lincoln? In his historical debate with Mr. Douglas, in 1858, over the issue between freedom and slavery, Mr. Lincoln in every instance assumed that the flag and the Constitution went together. I challenge the production of an utterance of that great apostle of liberty to the effect that Congress could govern any people anywhere without regard to the Constitution. There has never been a time in the history of the Republican party when it faltered in its support of the doctrine of the unity of the flag and the Constitution.

FLEXIBILITY OF THE CONSTITUTION.

But we are reminded that new and untried problems now confront us and demand solution. Grant it; but how can that aspect of the situation enlarge the constitutional powers of Congress? Our organic law is flexible and capable of adjustment to meet the demands of a progressive people—of an advancing civilization. That splendid adaptability is its most enduring principle. It would have been torn into shreds long ago had it not possessed the capacity for growth, for the development of a mighty race can never be hampered and circumscribed by arbitrary rules and limitations.

"The letter killeth but the spirit maketh alive" has been its canon of interpretation. But its historical development has always been in harmony with the fundamental laws of our political institutions. The principles underlying the Republic have shone through the provisions of the Constitution and lighted the pathway of political progress. They have been amplified and enlarged, but never violated. They are as imperishable as the laws of Newton and Kepler, and we can have no natural and permanent development excepting along the lines upon which we have always moved. They are the everlasting principles of civil liberty that have made the great Republic the most potent and conspicuous agency in all the world for the elevation of political life and thought.

According to the American standard, civil liberty consists in fundamental rights of person and property which the Government itself has no power to deny, even to the humblest citizen. Under arbitrary governments people enjoy privileges as a matter of favor from the rulers rather than as rights of person. In England public opinion is the only check upon the power of government, and it required hundreds of years to crystallize popular thought around the great principles essential to a free people. We have express limitations upon the Government in our written Constitution, and public opinion is relieved of the necessity of guarding against encroachments upon personal rights.

Our Constitution acts as a political buffer against which legislation is vehemently hurled. We know that the courts will set aside unconstitutional laws and, therefore, have no concern about our liberties. The founders of this Government were so jealous of their rights that they would not leave them to the protection of popular opinion. Every great power of government that was liable to abuse was safeguarded by express prohibitions and limitations, so there could be no opportunity for the exercise of arbitrary power.

THE POWER OF TAXATION.

If we have the power to pass this bill, we have the power of taxation over the Spanish islands without limitation. The power of taxation, from a practical standpoint, is the most important of all the powers of government and the one amongst all the others that excites the most jealousies. John Marshall expressed a great truth when he said, "The power to tax is the power to destroy." No people can ever be free with the arbitrary power of taxation over them vested in foreign authority. Nearly all the great contests for civil liberty for the last three hundred years have been waged over the power of taxation. It has been the storm center of the greatest struggles for human rights both in the forum and on the field. Nearly three hundred years ago England was drenched in blood and a king lost his head because the people would not submit to arbitrary taxation, and the result was that the principle that taxes should be imposed only by those who pay them became an unalterable principle in the English system.

Arbitrary taxation was the cause of the Revolutionary war. The colonists declared that the power of taxation should be exercised only by the taxpayers, and never was a principle more sublimely vindicated than in their seven years' struggle for independence. It was not the burden of the tax so much as the principle by which it was levied. Burke, in his great speech on "American Taxation," said:

> The feelings of the colonies were formerly the feelings of Great Britain. Theirs were formerly the feelings of Mr. Hampden when called upon for the payment of 20 shillings. Would 20 shillings have ruined Mr. Hampden's fortune? No; but the payment of half 20 shillings, on the principle it was demanded, would have made him a slave. It is the weight of that preamble, of which you are so fond, and not the weight of the duty, that the Americans are unable and unwilling to bear.

When the Revolutionary fathers came to frame their own government, so jealous were they of the power of taxation, so fearful were they of its abuse, that they refused to confer it upon the confederacy at all. They provided a system of contributions to be levied upon the States, with no power of enforcement. It was a melancholy failure, and the present Constitution followed.

In the light of history, and in view of their own experience, the taxing power was safeguarded in every possible manner. The principle that taxes could only justly be levied by the taxpayers was preserved. The Constitution declares that "all bills for raising revenues shall originate in the House of Representatives." Taxation and representation is an active, living principle to-day and will continue to be as long as there are people to govern. But it has a practical operation when applied to republican government. The philosophy of the principle is that taxes shall be imposed only by those who pay them, and self-interest is the highest guaranty against immoderation and abuse.

But, sir, when the Constitution was ordained we had all the Northwest Territory—an empire within itself—which it was expected would be carved into States. Under our plan of government sovereignty is in the people of the States, and, in the probationary State, the Territories would be governed by Congress. Congress would impose taxes upon the people of the Territories without their consent, and to provide against the abuse of that power the Constitution was made to declare that "all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." The only general power of taxation conferred upon Congress is granted with that limitation. Congress by express provision is given power to levy only a general uniform tax, and that limitation goes wherever the power of taxation extends. Congress can not carry into Territories or islands greater or different powers than those it possesses.

Thus we said to the people of the Territories, in the most solemn manner, "While you have no representation in the General Government, you shall bear only the same rate of taxation that we voluntarily impose upon ourselves." What higher guaranty of justice could be given? And that guaranty has been religiously observed in all our dealings with the Territories, and it fully preserves the principle of taxation and representation. The proposed tariff upon Porto Rican trade violates that guaranty and contravenes the great principle underlying the Federal system of taxation. If we can levy a tariff at all against American territory in contravention of the principle of uniformity, there is no limit to our power. We may levy 15 per cent of the Dingley rate now, the next Congress may levy the full Dingley rate, and the next may double it.

THE PROTECTIVE POLICY.

But, sir, we are told that this tariff is moderate and temporary only, and is justified by the exigencies of the situation. It is said to be for purposes of revenue only. Why not raise revenues in Porto Rico in the same manner that we raise them in New Mexico? We never before raised revenues for a Territory by imposing a tariff upon its trade.

The vice is in the policy that the measure foreshadows, rather than in the measure itself. We may desire the tariff to be temporary only, but the next Congress may make it permanent. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], in a speech in the House on the 28th day of February last, frankly avowed that the real purpose of the measure was to protect American labor against competition with the labor of the Spanish islands, and I have no doubt that he spoke the truth. If that is its purpose, is it to be temporary only? I am a believer in the protective policy, but I have never understood it to be the policy of my party to protect one section of the country against another by tariff restrictions on trade. It never has been attempted before.

It is our boast that there is absolute freedom of trade in all American territory. If we can protect the industries of the States against Porto Rican competition, how long before we will levy a tariff on the cheap wool of New Mexico and Arizona to protect the woolgrowers of Ohio? How long before we will impose a tariff upon the wheat growers in Oklahoma to protect the wheat farmers in Indiana?

There is justice and wisdom in protecting American industries against those of foreign countries. Foreign countries possess the powers of sovereignty, and they can retaliate by imposing restrictions against our trade. They can negotiate treaties of amity and commerce, and provide in general for the security of their own interests. But Porto Rico is not a foreign country. It has been annexed to and is as much a part of the United States as Arizona. We have completely absorbed its sovereignty, and it has no power to retaliate against what it might regard as unjust exactions. It has no international status except as part of this country, and of course it has no authority to make commercial alliances with foreign powers. The island is absolutely within our power, and utterly helpless to secure her own interests.

If it shall be our policy whenever our interests conflict with hers to employ the powers of the Government to protect our own, who in the name of heaven will protect Porto Rico? Is she to be fed upon the crumbs that fall from our sumptuous table? I have faith in the American people, and know that they would not oppress a helpless race. This is forcibly evinced by the strenuous protests against this measure coming from all parts of the land. But, sir, we are establishing a principle, and we should look it squarely in the face.

The Spanish islands are our foundlings, they are our wards, and our treatment of them must be characterized by the highest considerations of justice. We ought, at least, to maintain as high a standard of morals as that which is observed and enforced upon the part of individuals in their relations. It is the law in every State in the Union that whenever the interests of a guardian and his ward conflict the interests of the ward must be protected as against those of the guardian. The conscience of the country has made that principle of morals universal. Can the Government adopt a less elevated standard? In most of its relations the Government reflects the best sentiment of the justice of its people.

True, sir, we have been generous to Porto Rico, but generosity may ruin a race. The people of this country expect us to be just to that island. Vote to the Porto Ricans the money raised by this tax, and still the cry for justice will not be stifled. Put Porto Ricans on the footing of Americans, not foreigners; recognize the binding force of the Constitution and give them unrestricted trade with the States, and enterprise will be quickened, labor will find employment, and the cry of hunger be stilled. This is all they want.

Gold, sir, is not an equivalent for constitutional liberty. The bill recently passed appropriating the money received from Porto Rican tariffs to the use of the people of the island was a worthy act of justice, but we should not make too much of that virtue. That money was all collected from the people of the island after it had been annexed to this country. No other Territory ever had to pay such a tribute. It was a worthy act, I say, but only an act of justice.

The people of this country waged war against Spain to relieve human distress—to redeem a race from tyranny and oppression. Thousands of our best and bravest freely offered their lives in the cause of the downtrodden, and some of the most glorious pages of history are written in their blood. As an incident of that war, Cuba is to become free and independent and Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands are under our rightful sovereignty. We could not in honor return them to the despotism from which our blood and valor had redeemed them. Some misinformed and misguided inhabitants of the Philippines are resisting our authority. Those people are not capable of self-government, and our honored President is pursuing the only course left for us to pursue. They are under our rightful sovereignty, and it is our duty to overthrow the insurrection and establish civil government. The people are standing with the President upon this policy.

But, sir, they call upon us now to make good our professions of humanity and establish American liberty in Porto Rico. Gentlemen mistake the temper of the farmers and wage earners of the country, from whose ranks the armies of freedom are recruited, in believing they would deny the helpless people of Porto Rico, whose destiny is now in our keeping, any substantial guaranty of liberty for fear of industrial competition. During the civil war a half a million noble lives were sacrificed and billions of treasure expended to redeem a race from slavery.

Who halted them in the great work of freedom because of markets or industrial competition? There were men who said if the slaves are freed, they will flood the Northern States and drive out intelligent white labor. Those men were called "Copperheads" at that time. The work of freedom went on, and Northern labor suffered no disadvantages. There is no just ground to fear that the inhabitants of the Spanish islands will come into this country and displace American labor. They can not stand our climate nor live in our intense social conditions.

GOVERNMENT UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

In my judgment, sir, there will be infinitely less trouble and embarrassment if we govern the insular possessions under the Constitution than if we attempt to govern them as colonies. With a stable government, American capital will find investments there, and resources will be developed along lines in the main that will not compete with industries here. If competition should arise and we impose tariff restrictions on their trade, there, will be a constant surging upon the line for a lower rate there; a higher one here. There will be a persistent and irrepressible warfare with the weapon of taxation; of special interests against special interests. It will be practically impossible to have stable business conditions under that system and the development of the islands will necessarily be greatly retarded. Jealousies will be aroused, discontent will be engendered, and the expense and trouble of governing the people will be greatly increased.

I can not believe that American labor will suffer in competition with the inhabitants of the Philippines. They lack the intelligence and moral sturdiness to make them dangerous competitors. They can not operate machinery successfully, and their hand work is confined to narrow limits. Gentlemen exaggerate the dangers that will result from free commerce. A large number of the inhabitants of those islands have no civilization. They live in tribal relations and infest the interior among the mountains and jungles, living, in the main, upon nature's bounty. They are not producers for commerce and are not likely to be for a century.

The Republican party in the past has insisted upon protecting American labor against the intelligent, but poorly paid, labor of Europe. We have had no fear of competition with any other country. European labor was a dangerous competitor because of its sturdy, intelligent qualities—qualities which the Filipinos do not possess. English labor has been in open competition with the Orient for more than half a century, and England has the best paid labor in the world outside of this country. An average American can produce more wealth in a year than 20 Filipinos. It seems to me like an indictment against our civilization to claim that our intelligent, sturdy, capable, enterprising laboring men need protection against the earning capacity of the semisavage hordes of the Pacific islands.

But, sir, we are warned that if we can not govern the islands as we please, we must get rid of them. What difficulties will be encountered in applying the Constitution to the islands? We will make them American citizens. Well, what are they now? Every one is either a citizen or an alien. The islanders were subjects of Spain, but we broke that tie, and their allegiance was transferred to this country. Have they no status? The numerous tribes of Filipinos who have never acknowledged allegiance to Spain or this country were not Spanish subjects and have not become citizens of the United States. They occupy the relation that the American Indian sustains to the United States. Their allegiance is to the tribal chief and not to this Government. But when they become civilized, they would be citizens, and why should they not be? There is no danger of their coming over here and becoming Congressmen and Senators.

Now, what would be their rights under the Constitution? Only those primary rights of person and property that are a necessary incident to freedom. They would be entitled to the equal protection of the laws; the right of petition; freedom of speech and press; freedom of conscience; immunity from excessive bail, unseasonable search, and cruel and inhuman punishment; the right of the guaranty that life, liberty, and property shall not be disturbed without due process of law; the right to bear arms under proper restrictions, habeas corpus, jury trials, and uniformity of taxation. These are all the rights the Constitution guarantees, and is there one of them that should be withheld? The right of trial by jury could soon be made practicable. Courts would be held in centers of population, and little difficulty would arise in selecting competent jurors.

Respecting everything else Congress would have absolute power. The Federal Constitution does not confer a single political right or privilege. Those are all granted by State laws or Federal statutes. Look at the District of Columbia, with its population of a quarter of a million. Congress makes every law for its government, imposes the taxes, and regulates every feature of municipal life, and the citizens have no voice in the government whatever. They have no votes, yet they are all citizens of the United States and under the protection of the flag and the Constitution.

Congress has no power to govern them arbitrarily. Do we need any wider latitude in governing the Philippine Islands? We can adjust the character of government to meet the degree of civil development all the way from a government by a commission appointed by the President, in which the natives have no participation whatever, up through the various stages of political organization to a complete Territorial government, with entire local autonomy. Do we need any more latitude than the Constitution gives us? Most certainly not.

We are charged with discrediting the generosity of the American people by contending for constitutional liberty for the inhabitants of the Spanish islands. Do we? Constitutional protection is regarded as necessary for the security of person and property here, and why is it not in Porto Rico? Acts of Congress and of State legislatures are often set aside by the courts for violation of the Constitution. Capital would feel insecure in many instances were it not for the constitutional limitations upon the power of government. If the Constitution is necessary for the protection of interests here in our very presence—interests that have powerful social and political influence—how infinitely greater must be the necessity for the protection of interests out of our sight and sympathy, 10,000 miles away, with no political or social influence whatever!

We declared our purpose to establish American liberty in those islands. We gave our sons as a holy pledge of the honesty of our intentions. Shall we halt now to nicely calculate the effect on markets? But even upon that basis our interests can not suffer. The prestige of our presence in the very gateway of the Orient will give us new commercial fields to conquer. The impulse to our Asiatic trade by our occupancy of the Philippines will create new and increased demands for our products and more labor for our wage-earners.

It would seem safe to predict that we will gain four days' labor on account of those islands to where we can possibly lose one by competition. There may come minor industrial disturbances, but adjustments will soon follow. We can not be diverted from a broad policy by this special interest or that. We can not hope to control the onward sweep of destiny to meet the occasional demands of somebody's business affairs. Let us pursue a broad, humane policy, and all interests will readily accommodate themselves to it.

OUR DESTINY.

This Republic came into being as a protest against arbitrary government. No place was left in our system for the exercise of arbitrary powers here or elsewhere. No tyrant ever oppressed a people that he did not do it under the pretext that it was for their own good. The fathers knew this and supposed they had permanently removed from temptation all arbitrary powers. There is room among the nations of the earth, with all their clashings of selfishness, for one government to stand as the living exponent of those great principles of civil and political liberty that are necessary for the regeneration of humanity. We have occupied that proud distinction for more than a hundred years, and we have grown great and glorious in the minds of men and in the sight of Almighty God for our fidelity to our professions.

During all the years of our national life we have stood unremittingly against absolutism, and by precept and example have inspired hope in the hearts of men struggling for liberty the world around. And now, at the sunrise of a new century, after we have become great and magnificent as the representative of the wisest system of government ever devised by the genius of man, shall we turn our backs upon our splendid history, give the lie to our traditions, and by our example justify the imposition of arbitrary conditions upon helpless races? Such a course, in my humble opinion, would discredit the memory of every patriot from Washington to Lawton.

We hear much in these days about the coming conflict of races and congratulate ourselves upon the ultimate triumph of the Anglo-Saxon civilization. This is the mightiest race the world ever saw, but ultimate survival will not be of race, but of principle. With the dissemination of intelligence throughout the world, the people will come to know and be moved to assert their power, and the law of natural selection will dominate political as well as all other phases of life. Those systems and principles best calculated to elevate and bless mankind will become the inheritance of all the earth. In the final struggle that nation, that race which is the highest exponent of those great systems and principles, will be in at the last. The American Republic is in the van to-day because it is the truest representative of those great political truths that the world has yet known. Let her motto be, The Constitution and the flag, forever inseparable—the substance and the hope of universal liberty. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCALL. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has fourteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MCCALL. I reserve that.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'GRADY].

Mr. O'GRADY. Mr. Speaker, the bill for the financial relief of Porto Rico has been so exhaustively debated in this House that I would not venture to discuss it now were it not for the fact that one or two phases of the question have been but indifferently considered; and I do not believe that enough stress has been laid upon the duty our country owes to its own people and its own institutions, while altogether too much importance is put upon what is claimed is our plain duty toward the island possessions held by us now as the fortune of war. Porto Rico came to us unexpectedly, but as the result of the universal demand of our people that Spanish rule in the Western Hemisphere should cease. It came to us at the demand of an armed and powerful force, led by the commanding general of the American Army. To say it came to us with open arms is a pleasant and agreeable fiction.

If the people of Porto Rico met our Army with shouts and acclamations, remember that they had few guns and less ammunition, and that they were pursuing the wisest course under such circumstances. All accounts go to prove that prior to the war Porto Rico was entirely loyal to Spain. There was little, if any, civil disturbance there even after the intervention of this country in the Cuban insurrection, when Spain's hands were full trying to stem the tide against her. Porto Rico, therefore, stands in exactly the same position as any other territory reverting to the successful contestants as the price of peace or the indemnity for war expense, or the result of the exigency of the situation—a sort of geographical necessity. What shall be done with her, and how best shall she be aided in working out her destiny and preparing herself for the full measure of American liberty?

On the constitutional questions, Mr. Speaker, my mind is clear. I have studied carefully the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, upon which the other side of this House relies for its authority, and those upon which the Republican party bases its action. There is some authority on both sides, I admit. But I find, Mr. Speaker, that when I invoke to my aid common sense and the principles of international law and comity and apply them to the constitutional question, a glare of light is thrown on the subject, and there is no trouble for me to understand what is meant by the decisions.

The doctrine that the Constitution ex proprio vigore (by its own force) extended over all territory belonging to the United States was first invoked in the unholy cause of slavery. The Western Territories were demanding anti-slavery laws, and the belief that this iniquitous institution was becoming weaker in what were soon to be new States caused Calhoun and his followers to discover that the Constitution had already extended over these prospective States, in only one particular, however, to the extent of forbidding the passage of anti-slavery laws by Congress or Territorial legislatures. It never was invoked in any serious contention prior to that; and while the Supreme Court has touched upon it in one or two cases since, these are of little consequence, and the court so indicates in its opinions.

To this doctrine of Calhoun I can make no better answer and in no stronger and clearer terms than that of the Republicans of 1856 and 1860 assembled in national convention. In 1856 the Republican party in its national platform declared:

Resolved, That the Constitution confers upon Congress sovereign power over the Territories of the United States for their government, and that in the exercise of this power it is both the right and the duty of Congress to prohibit in the Territories those twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery.

In 1860 the Republican party again in no uncertain language condemned Calhounism in these vigorous words:

The new dogma, that the Constitution of its own force carries slavery into any or all of the Territories of the United States, is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with the explicit provisions of the instrument itself, with contemporaneous exposition, and with legislative and judicial precedent, is revolutionary in its tendency, and subversive of the peace and harmony of the country.

On that platform the country was carried and Abraham Lincoln elected, and a bloody war placed the deadly seal of its disapproval upon that doctrine.

Mr. Speaker, what is meant by the terms "sovereign power," "the sovereignty of the people," "national sovereignty?" Our friends on the other side seem to think that they are terms of limitation and and intended to curtail the power of the American people. I can not place this interpretation upon them.

The best lexicographers define "sovereign" as supreme power; possessing supreme dominion; not subject to another; the power exercising supreme control or dominion and to which allegiance is due.

Cooley defines sovereignty as the supreme, absolute, uncontrollable power by which any State is governed.

Halleck calls it the political authority, whether vested in a single individual or in a number of individuals, to order and direct what is to be done by each individual in relation to the end and object of the state. Thus in the United States, sovereignty is vested in the body of adult male citizens.

Maine says that this person or combination of persons has in all communities one characteristic common to all the shapes sovereignty may take, the possession of irresistible force. The sovereign, if a single person, is a monarch; if a small group, the name is an oligarchy; if a group of considerable dimensions, an aristocracy; if very large and numerous, a democracy.

Mr. Speaker, in all of these definitions we find one essential to complete sovereignty—power unlimited within the sphere of governmental influence. Is a government of the people any less potent than that of a usurper? Is the United States lacking in some of the attributes possessed by other nations? To admit that is monstrous. It would prevent us waging a defensive war. Because, if engaged in such a war, we could never enter the enemy's country to drive him from it or to crush his armies. The contest would always have to be upon our own territory for fear that the end of the war might find us in possession of some of the enemy's country, and this conquered country could never, according to the orators on the other side of this Chamber, be submitted to a period of probation and instruction.

Such a contention carries its own refutation. No loyal American, if he will but stop to think, will subscribe to it for a moment. Under its teaching American liberty and American institutions could never be spread upon the face of the earth; but hedged about by this incomprehensible, indefinite limitation of national power, the great American Republic must lay supine and helpless before the world. I never will admit that my country lacks in national attributes or is inferior in national power, in peace or in war, to the other great powers of the world; that the Republic of the people is not the equal of monarchical England, autocratic Russia, imperial Germany, or republican France.

If the people of the United States, in whom rests the great power of the nation, can not avail themselves of the rights of national conquest, why did we dare go to war with Spain, even in a just cause? Are the people free, independent, and self-governing, less potent than when they are bound in the debasing fetters of autocratic or imperial statehood? Is the gladiator with every muscle in full play weaker in some intangible way than when loaded with chains? In our brief history we have fought successfully four foreign wars and one great civil war, for no one of which there would be the slightest justification were the contention of the opponents of this measure to be admitted. The only logical deduction is that the Constitution is extended to newly acquired territory only by specific enactment of Congress.

And now, Mr. Speaker, what are the provisions of this bill now before the House for approval? It may be treated under two general heads: First, the raising of revenue for temporary purposes, and, second, the proposed scheme of government for the island.

Let us consider for a moment the revenue feature of the bill. It is provided that there shall be a duty amounting to 15 per cent of the rates prescribed by the Dingley tariff upon all goods entering Porto Rico from the United States and upon all goods entering the United States from Porto Rico, except only such articles as have heretofore been placed by Executive order upon the free list. Not 15 per cent flat, understand, but 15 per cent of the existing tariff rates of the Dingley law.

It is further provided that there shall be a 5 cents per pound duty on coffee imported into the island to protect the coffee raised there, which is of a higher quality and could not exist in competition with the cheap coffee of the South American countries. Since we have had possession of Porto Rico and it has been under military law, there has been established by order of the President a free list of articles which pay no duty. In the present bill this free list is continued in operation. It is well to examine it for a moment. From time to time there have been included plows, cane knives, agricultural implements, books and maps, quinine, fresh fish, machinery for agricultural and sugar-refining purposes, flour, rice, codfish, pork, bacon, rough lumber, fresh beef, mutton, sugar bagging, coopers' wares, sugar casks and materials to make them, and school furniture.

Is there any hardship to Porto Rico here? Does not this list include all the necessaries of the people? What food stuff is omitted? What necessity of life lacking? All these articles are to continue to be admitted free of any duty whatever. Again, whenever the legislative assembly of Porto Rico shall provide a system of local taxation to support the government, the tariff of 15 per cent shall cease, and in any event there shall be no tariff after March 1, 1902. And still again, the proceeds of the 15 per cent tariff, not only that which is to be raised in Porto Rico but likewise the gross amount of all such duties received at the United States ports, are to be reserved for the exclusive benefit of Porto Rico and to be used for the expenses and needs of the island alone.

What more generous treatment could the island obtain from any country? We did not do this in the case of Louisiana or Florida or California or the Gadsden purchase or Alaska. In the case of these Territories the receipts from tariff taxes were covered into the National Treasury for the benefit of the whole country. But in the case of Porto Rico every dollar goes back to the island and for its own domestic purposes.

Now, let us see if the method of raising the revenue is unjust or a hardship to the island. Revenue must be raised from some source and in some practical way. It seems to me that we are limited to one of three or four methods, namely, either by a direct appropriation from the Treasury of the United States, or by direct taxation upon land, or by a loan, or the method contemplated by this bill—that is, a low tariff on imports and exports that will distribute evenly and lightly the burdens of supporting the government. Our people would not be willing to see a direct appropriation from the Treasury for the benefit of Porto Rico. If the island is to be self-supporting, let it be so from the start; if it can not maintain itself now and at once, we were much better rid of it.

Direct taxation will not do, because, according to General Davis, outside of the municipalities there is but little to tax, and since the terrible hurricane the rural communities are without the means or ability to pay direct taxes; nor is there any method by which direct taxes can be equitably distributed among all the people. General Davis says that 75 per cent of the males over 21 years of age are abjectly poor.

> They live in huts made of sticks and poles covered over with thatches of palm leaves. A family of a dozen may be huddled together in one room, often with only a dirt floor. They have little food worthy of the name and only the most scanty clothing, while children of less than seven or eight years are often entirely naked. A few may own a machete or a hoe, but more have no worldly possessions whatever. Their food is fruit, and if they are wage-earners, a little rice and codfish in addition.

It is useless to talk about direct taxation with such a people as this unless time is taken to develop some new and equitable system, and to educate the people to understand and submit to it.

As far as a loan is concerned, in order to make one there must be a government in Porto Rico in working order with all its machinery, such as is provided by the Senate bill. In order to obtain a reasonably low rate of interest there must be a regularly established government of sufficient stability to insure a proper return of the loan.

Indirect taxation is therefore the only logical and feasible system of raising this necessary revenue. There is certainly no hardship about it, and it can be terminated under the bill just as soon as the Porto Ricans themselves desire it and manifest by their votes and voices a wish to substitute some other method of taxation. In every State of the Union indirect taxation is being resorted to to lighten the burdens of direct taxation which weigh so heavily upon land. To say that temporarily, until the inhabitants can be adjusted or adjust themselves to American methods of living and learn how to enjoy benefits of American citizenship, the Porto Ricans can not raise their revenue in this way is to subject them to hardships that we would not force upon our own people.

The methods of taxation in Porto Rico have always been what are known as tariff taxes, most of them unjust and burdensome. These have been largely abolished because of their hardship. To introduce a new method of internal taxation will require time—at least a year, possibly longer. Experts are now in the island or on their way there, called for by the military governor to advise with him concerning the new methods and new ways of raising internal revenue. Shall we refuse them a reasonable time for their investigation?

Our Democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber have been denouncing the tariff as having been imposed in the interests of the trusts. If this were true, it would be very wicked and reprehensible. But inasmuch as they are always making us out to be the champions of evil things, the accusation from their lips falls flat and does not ring true. The two trusts that are aimed at by their clamor are presumably the sugar and tobacco trusts. By what process of reasoning can it be conceived that the sugar trust is in favor of a duty on its raw sugar, the only sugar product that Porto Rico will bring to the United States market?

And how can a tariff upon the tobacco grown in the island help the tobacco trust? Is it not to the plain interest of both of these trusts to demand no tariff at all on its raw sugar and its raw tobacco? As a matter of fact, they are behind the movement in favor of free trade, because they see very plainly that under this present tariff bill they must pay their share toward the expenses of the island and help bear the burden that they prefer to shirk to the backs of some one else. Is it not plain to the most casual observer who stops to consider the subject but for a moment that when we give to Porto Rico the President's free list, and return to them every dollar collected from the tariff and indicate in no uncertain terms that this plan is but temporary and to last only so long as the island is in the transition stage from Spanish to American citizenship, that Congress is extending to them a helping hand in the true spirit of the brotherhood of the great Republic?

I would be the last one, by my voice or vote, to countenance for one moment the exploitation of this new Territory for the benefit of the United States. I am unalterably opposed to such a course. I would never vote for this bill did I believe that such a motive dictated its passage. I feel that Providence has placed in our hands this opportunity of demonstrating to the world that the American idea of liberty and freedom can flourish in tropical and semitropical lands, and, true to their traditions and teachings, I feel that the American people will rise to their opportunity, and with the dawning of the new century there will burst upon the downtrodden and oppressed in every land, east and west, north and south, the knowledge that the brotherhood of man is the only true sign of liberty and hope of future earthly progress.

I lack the time to enter into an exhaustive treatment of the governmental features of this bill. Other men who, because of their special work in connection with the plans of Territorial government proposed for Porto Rico and Hawaii, have given study to the subject will doubtless expound its various features. It is enough to say that the best precedents furnished by the action of Congress in the case of former territorial acquisitions have been followed. No innovations are attempted. In dealing with this island and its people the fact should be borne in mind that it has had no preparation for American government. Four hundred years it has been Spanish, and it is to-day Spanish in customs, in manners, in morals, and in ideals. If it is ever truly American, all of these conditions must be completely changed and many of them absolutely eradicated.

We believe that they all wish to become good American citizens, but it is our bounden duty to discourage any hesitancy upon their part. We will find at every stage discouragements and disappointments. But we can not turn back. We must impress upon them kindly but firmly that for them Spain is a tradition, America a reality. Our citizenship and our institutions will impress themselves upon the Porto Ricans slowly. They will doubtless regret often their former relationship with easy-going, decaying old Spain. Their regeneration will cost them many a pang. But the helping hand and the guiding voice of the American people will be always present to them.

Under the terms of this bill they may with unprecedented celerity assume to govern themselves. Whether they will at an early date avail themselves of the opportunity is accompanied with grave doubts. The experience is not encouraging in this direction. In the face of great public interest a municipal election in one of the towns developed a vote of less than 5 per cent of the voting population was polled. But by this bill we give them the opportunity and can only trust that it will be quickly embraced.

As I conclude, Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned the observation that were we not on the eve of a Presidential election there would not be a party alignment on the passage of this bill. In all the debate there has been had in opposition to it I have not heard a single alternative suggestion from the opposition. No substitute measure is proposed. As usual, all they wish is to break down the affirmative legislation. Their voice is negative. But I am not fearful of the result of this bill. I have an abiding faith in the American people, in their judgment and their common sense. They will know whether justice or injustice has been done.

They will be quick to discern whether an honest effort has been made to meet an unusual situation, and with that fairness that always characterizes them they will brush aside the sophistry and vagaries of Democratic oratory and pin their faith in the future as in the past to the party that dares to do right. It is not the first time that Republican policy has been assailed and maligned, but Republican policy has always triumphed and has never failed to become the country's policy and the national law. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides a government for Porto Rico, provides revenue to relieve the urgent and pressing needs of the people there, and gives them the option to say how long the revenue shall continue.

I do not regard it as a perfect bill, but all legislation is matter of compromise, in that it strikes an average among conflicting views.

This legislation is one of the links in the long chain of cause and effect, beginning with the war with Spain and stretching into the future.

We all remember how that war commenced. We had been patrolling our coast at some expense to ourselves to prevent the breach of international law by our own patriotic people in their sympathy for Cuba. The people, without regard to party, were clamoring at the doors of Congress demanding war with Spain. Every member was bombarded with letters demanding war.

Gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, mistaking the secrecy of preparation for the sloth of inaction, indulged in denunciation of delay and expressions of rampant belligerency.

This was safe, inasmuch as they knew they assumed no responsibility for action or inaction, and only expected to sit around the purlieus of this Capitol and criticise whatever was done. Few of them ever had any idea of pulling a trigger, or, in the language of my friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], taking a place in the picture near the flashing of the guns.

Many gentlemen will remember how the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] wandered up and down the aisles of this House declaiming in Addisonian English, touched with a flavor of Pike County provincialism, about dragging somebody into war by the scruff of the neck.

Then the battle ship Maine sailed into the harbor of Havana proudly flying the Stars and Stripes and bravely manned. She was piloted to her anchorage of death by a Spanish Government pilot. She was destroyed by a Spanish submarine mine.

Other war ships have gone down since then.

On the 1st day of May, 1898, Dewey sailed into the harbor of Manila and transformed the Spanish Pacific squadron into scrap iron before breakfast.

A little later, and the pride of Spain's navy under Cervera was sunk in shot-shattered fragments along the Cuban coast.

Santiago was taken, and the Stars and Stripes went up there over a victorious American army and a surrendering Spanish army.

That flag, which has purified the air that kissed it, still remains there, but the Constitution has not followed it there.

Gentlemen say the Constitution follows the flag. That is not true. The Constitution follows the flag or not as we please and when we please.

REGENERATION OF CUBA.

After the fall of Santiago we began the work of renovation, reorganization, and regeneration. We first drove out the Spaniards and then we began to kill off the yellow-fever microbe.

The first ship into the harbor of Santiago was not the flagship of a victorious admiral, entering with all the pomp and circumstance of conquest, but was a ship piloted by Mercy, flying the Red Cross flag, and carrying food, medicine, and relief for the people of Cuba. That is what an American conquest meant in Cuba. It has meant no less in Porto Rico.

The order of Weyler had herded thousands of persons, accustomed to the free, pure air of mountain and plain, in cities where narrow streets were shrouded with the white winding sheet of poisonous mist by night, and where Famine and Plague stalked abroad at noontide.

These reconcentrados were women and children and feeble men. For shelter they had huts thatched with palm leaves and sided with the bark of trees. Into these shelters tenderly nurtured women crawled with their children. As food grew scarce the children learned to forage in the streets like dogs. They stood in their filthy shelters and saw their mothers die, some of them too young to know the meaning of death. They only knew she did not speak to them when they cried and did not wipe away their tears. Hunger drove them out again, and when they returned their mother was not there. This is what the order of Weyler did in the closing years of this nineteenth century.

Sir, when I think of these things I am glad our guns shot true and that armored ships went down before them like cockleshells, because it strengthens human belief that God cares, and that the scriptural sparrow story is not a mere figure of speech.

I believe that God rules the affairs of men and nations. Behind the visible work stands the Invisible. The visible work is sometimes savage and incomprehensible. The Invisible is sublime.

The years seem long to human comprehension; but with the infinite a thousand years are as a day.

We went to war with Spain for a cause unique in history—the cause of humanity. Henceforth let no man say the days of knighthood have passed by. In all the range of history no knightlier deed was ever done.

PORTO RICO.

Will any man say that the nation capable of doing what we have done in Cuba would be capable of wrong in Porto Rico or the Philippines? The very solicitude of the American people about Porto Rico is a splendid commentary upon the heart and soul of our nationality.

Incident to the war with Spain we took Porto Rico and the Philippines. Did the gentlemen who urged on the war suppose we could win without results, win without trophies?

In the government of her colonial possessions Spain has known no higher duty than to plunder them, and at last she has deservedly lost them.

Porto Rico comes to us with a population bowed, burdened, and stunted with three hundred years of Spanish rule.

Laborers whose wages in youth and old age are 10 cents a day and in the noontide of manhood 30 cents a day predominate in a population of a million people, who throng the island from beach to mountain top.

The island is owned in 43,000 estates, largely by English, Spanish, and other foreign sugar, coffee, and tobacco growers.

The hand of Spain has been heavy on her people. She has reaped where she has not sown; she has gathered where she has not strewn. About 85 per cent of the Porto Rican population is illiterate.

Spanish avarice and greed have ruled there in the jungles of human ignorance which Spain has fostered.

Spain has built no schoolhouses, but she has taxed her people, coming and going, sleeping and waking, at the church and at the grave, so that the holy bans of wedlock have been disregarded because of the fees and exactions of governmental avarice, and men and women have lived together by mutual consent and brought children into the world without the sanction of lawful marriage.

THE STORM.

Last August a hurricane swept the island and wreck and ruin and famine followed in its train.

Macaulay, in his Essay on Barère, says: "A man who has never been within the Tropics does not know what a thunderstorm means; a man who has never looked on Niagara has but a faint idea of a cataract, and he who has not read Barère's Memoirs does not know what it is to lie."

So he who did not witness the storm that swept over Porto Rico can have but little conception of a hurricane, and he who has not heard the medley of Democratic oratory on the Porto Rican question can have little conception of inconsistency.

After that storm the generosity of the American people responded nobly. If that storm had happened under Spanish rule, the island would have rotted in fecund desolation.

RELIEF.

Immediately the public mind began to cast about for relief.

Under the direction of the President $1,000,000 of an emergency fund was used there.

The President suspended the Dingley duties on necessaries going that way.

We have passed a bill here giving to the Porto Rican poor $2,095,000 out of the public Treasury. In addition to this we gave them all the duties collected in Porto Rico amounting to $1,500,000. In all we have given them about $5,000,000.

All that a generous and humane people could do to help them has been done.

Obviously a tax for their relief could not be levied on their destitution.

When they ask for bread, would ye give them a stone?

What a glorious thing it would be for a hungry Porto Rican to be told by some gentleman with harveyized lungs that the Constitution is there and has brought with it the beneficent operation of an internal-revenue system with which to collect out of wretchedness and distress something with which to relieve wretchedness and distress!

On March 31 last, only eleven days ago, Governor-General Davis declared that—

If Congress should adopt free trade the receipts of the custom-houses would naturally cease. One million five hundred thousand dollars have been collected during the fiscal year, and with free trade this will fall off. What then will run the island? * * * If free trade is adopted, I can not see how the necessary funds for conducting the affairs of the island are to be raised by myself or those who succeed me. Two million dollars are the present expenses, and this amount will be needed annually. There is only a small revenue incoming from stamps, liquors, tobacco, and mercantile licenses, and it is impossible to collect taxes because of the conditions.

THE TRUSTS.

We gave back to the people of Porto Rico all the duties collected of the sugar and tobacco trusts when we appropriated that $2,095,000; and the sugar and tobacco trusts, filling the constitutional arguments of our Democratic friends as a brief to back their claims in court, have commenced suit against the collector of customs of the port of New York, to recover back the money they have paid.

Gentlemen have claimed that this duty was a tax on poverty, but this suit ought to make clear who pays the tax.

And to cap the climax of Democratic cooperation with trusts, Senator JONES of Arkansas, chairman of the Democratic national committee, introduced in the United States Senate an amendment proposing to pay back the money collected to the persons from whom it had been collected, and these persons turn out to be the trusts.

And while this has been going on, a certain class of newspapers have been telling the people that what was nedeed to help the Porto Ricans was to let sugar and tobacco in free, as if any benefit could ever possibly percolate down to Porto Rican poverty by giving free trade to a sugar or a tobacco trust.

BENEFITS CONFERRED.

By this bill we give free necessities to the Porto Ricans. We give them free flour, rice, codfish, pork, bacon, fresh beef and mutton, machinery for making and refining sugar and other agricultural purposes, plows, hoes, hatchets and other agricultural implements, quinine, rough lumber, and wood for making hogsheads and casks for sugar and molasses.

We are charging Cuba the full Dingley rates on imports, but we charge Porto Rico only 15 per cent of Dingley rates, and having collected this duty of those who are able to pay it we turn it over for the relief of the poverty-stricken people there.

We use this money to restore the island, to rebuild its roads, to feed its people, and to build schoolhouses wherein to fit them for citizenship.

Sir, to my mind no nobler use can be made of money than to use it for the building of schoolhouses.

And then we organize for them a government—they who have never known what it was to have a government with consideration for their interests; and when they, through that government so formed, shall inform the President that they no longer need this relief it shall cease on Presidential proclamation, so that this measure is essentially and avowedly temporary in its nature and the time of its existence is to be dependent upon the option of the Porto Ricans themselves.

CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

But gentlemen say all this is unconstitutional and can not be done. They say the Constitution, ex proprio vigore, extends to the island of Porto Rico and that we can not relieve them in this way.

Well, sir, if the Constitution is there, what law is in force there to put the Constitution in operation?

Blackstone says (1 Com., 107):

> In conquered or ceded countries that have already laws of their own the king may indeed alter and change those laws; but till he does actually change them, the ancient laws of the country remain, unless such as are against the law of God.

In Blankard vs. Galdy (2 Salkeld, 411), the court said:

> That it was impossible the laws of this nation by mere conquest, without more, should take place in a conquered country; because for a time there must want officers, without which our laws can have no force.

See also Calvin's Case (7 Rep., 17; 2 P. Wms. Rep., 75), Campbell vs. Hall (Cowp., 204), Attorney-General vs. Stewart (2 Merivale, 143).

Chancellor Kent says (I Com., 178, Note a):

> The laws, usages, and municipal regulations in force at the time of the conquest or cession, remain in force until changed by the new sovereign.

In Mitchell vs. United States (9 Peters, 711 [1835]), a case which arose as to land titles in East Florida, the court said (733, 748):

> According to the established principles of the laws of nations the laws of a conquered or ceded country remain in force till altered by the new sovereign.

See also Strother vs. Lucas (12 Pet., 410, 436 [1838]), a case relating to land titles under the Louisiana cession.

But notwithstanding these authorities, if the contention of the gentlemen be true, and the Constitution extends itself immediately and automatically to newly acquired territory, all laws in operation in such newly acquired territory would be swept away. The Constitution would supplant them.

But is it true that the Constitution does extend itself of its own force and does supplant existing law in acquired territory?

Did it do so in the case of Louisiana? Certainly not.

It is understood that Jefferson and Madison drew the law for the government of the Territory of Louisiana, and by that law they did not extend the Constitution, but continued in force existing laws at variance with the Constitution. Governor Claiborne was given autocratic power. He promulgated ordinances which had the force of law. He had the power of removal at will.

Under the mediæval Spanish law then in force he who reviled Deity had his tongue cut out and his property confiscated. Freedom of speech was curtailed. In criminal cases a defendant could demand a jury only in capital cases. In civil cases parties could have a jury when the amount in controversy was over $100. Obviously both the Constitution and such laws could not operate together. Obviously the Constitution was not there.

But suppose the Constitution should go immediately to acquired territory, thereby sweeping away existing law, what then?

What laws are there in existence in the acquired territory to put the provisions of the Constitution, which has obtruded itself of its own force, in operation?

If the Constitution extends itself forthwith, ex proprio vigore, would it not result that crime could not be suppressed because there was no provision for a grand jury or for unanimous verdicts by petit juries, and questions of private right could not be settled for the same reason that there was no provision for unanimous verdicts, and the right of the people, however hostile, to keep and bear arms could not be infringed, and trade with other countries might be suspended because there was no law extending the United States shipping and customs laws to the newly acquired territory and no machinery for the collection of duties under United States laws, and vessels registered under the laws of the acquired territory would be without a flag, so that, in a word, there would be constitutional anarchy instead of constitutional order.

In Florida Andrew Jackson ruled with an iron hand. The Constitution did not extend itself there; but two kinds of laws were extended there, viz, those relating to collection of revenue and those relating to the slave trade.

The case of the American Insurance Company vs. Canter arose. The case was decided by Chief Justice Marshall and argued on behalf of claimant by Daniel Webster. In the course of the argument Webster said:

> What is Florida? It is no part of the United States. How can it be? How is it represented? Do the laws of the United States reach Florida? Not unless by particular provisions. The Territory and all within it are to be governed by the acquiring power, except where there are reservations by treaty.

In deciding the case Chief Justice Marshall said, speaking of the inhabitants:

> They do not participate in political power. They do not share in government until Florida shall become a State. In the meantime Florida continues to be a Territory of the United States, governed by virtue of that clause in the Constitution which empowers Congress "to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

Of this proposition that the Constitution extends itself Benton says:

> History can not class higher than as a vagary of a diseased imagination this imputed self-acting and self-extension of the Constitution. The Constitution does nothing of itself, not even in the States for which it was made. Every part of it requires a law to put it into operation. No part of it can reach a Territory unless imparted to it by act of Congress.

RENEWAL OF CALHOUN DOCTRINE.

This theory that the Constitution extends itself is the old Calhoun doctrine brought down to date, whereby it was declared that the Constitution extended itself and thereby extended slavery, which it recognized and provided for by the provision whereby three-fifths of slaves were counted in the apportionment of Representatives in Congress, and the provision whereby fugitive slaves were to be returned to their masters.

This doctrine that the Constitution extended itself and therefore slavery finally found expression in the Dred Scott decision. It found expression also in the action of the seceding States and was discussed and finally settled on many battlefields.

The contrary doctrine, that the Constitution did not extend itself and slavery, found expression in a declaration by the first national convention of the Republican party held in Philadelphia in 1856, wherein it—

> Resolved, That the Constitution confers on Congress sovereign powers over the Territories of the United States for their government.

It found expression in the platform on which Abraham Lincoln was nominated in 1860, wherein it was declared:

> That the new dogma that the Constitution of its own force carries slavery into any or all of the Territories of the United States is a dangerous political heresy, at variance with the explicit provisions of that instrument itself.

On that platform Abraham Lincoln was nominated and elected.

For the principle enunciated in that platform Abraham Lincoln finally died and has taken his place among martyrs with brow gleaming through all eternity with a martyr's crown.

THE TERRITORIAL RELATION.

Sir, I would rather follow John Marshall, Daniel Webster, Abraham Lincoln, and William McKinley than to follow John C. Calhoun and Judge Taney.

All territory which has come to us heretofore, with the single exception of Texas, I believe, has been held in an intermediate and probationary relation. We have governed it, as in the case of New Mexico, by executive government; we have governed it by military power, we have governed it as we have governed Alaska, and we have governed it as organized territory.

But suppose we admit your contention. Where does it leave you? Oh, ye blind leaders of the blind! You say that all territory becomes immediately an integral part of the United States and that the Constitution extends itself at once; therefore, under your contention, Porto Rico and the Philippines are an integral part of the United States, and the Constitution is there; and yet you want to pull down the flag and abandon the Philippines. But if your contention be true, how could you do this? Can any part of a whole abandon any part of itself? If you can not control the Constitution in its extension, how can you withdraw it; and if you can not withdraw it, how can you dispose of that which has come under it?

It is the enlightened policy of the Republican party that we can control acquired territory not only for its best interest but for our best interest, and while we shall carefully guard the rights of the inhabitants of territory, at the same time we shall see to it that the wage-earner and the farmer of the United States are not put upon a level of injurious competition with the Malay labor of the Orient.

At one of the great gateways of our nation there stands the statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, typical of our national liberty. Its light has flashed southward and illumined the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. Its light has flashed westward and illumined the islands that sit in darkness, and wherever it shines it lights up the Stars and Stripes on their way to give to other nations in the fullness of time the knowledge and experience of liberty under law, and wherever that flag goes the names of Abraham Lincoln and William McKinley go with it as guarantors of its beneficent purpose. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] has fourteen minutes remaining.

Mr. McCALL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER].

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Speaker, I have always favored civil government for the island of Porto Rico, but I have only thought of giving the people of that island such government as free men should give to those who come under their control by conquest or otherwise. I will only vote for a civil government bill when it will give them such government as we would accept for ourselves.

I am sure this measure would not be accepted by any man favoring it on the floor of this House if the conditions were reversed and were it in his power to resist it. I assure you I would never accept it.

I am a protectionist and an expansionist. I favor protecting American industries against foreign competition, but do not favor protecting the commercial interests of one or more of our own States or Territories against another. And when I find that we can not expand, assimilate, and extend to our new territories the same rights and privileges that we insist upon for ourselves, then I will no longer favor expansion.

I am convinced that we can treat the people of Porto Rico as we do the people of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma without in any way affecting our industry, progress, or civilization; and the benefit will be mutual.

Therefore I favor retaining the island and extending to it all the rights and privileges of American citizenship as enjoyed by the people in our other Territories, and thereby keep the pledge made to the people of the island by General Miles. The people of the United States rightfully expect and demand that this shall be done.

By this bill, after the 11th day of April, 1900, the people of Porto Rico are denied their natural right to choose a sovereign. It provides that they shall be citizens of the island of Porto Rico, and as such entitled to the protection of the United States.

The laws of every European country, in so far as I am informed, and including our own law, provide that aliens wishing to become citizens must renounce allegiance to their sovereign.

The subjects of any European power may become citizens of the United States (if they are of good character) by declaring allegiance to the United States and renouncing allegiance to their present sovereign. The Spanish subjects living on the island of Porto Rico on the 11th day of April, 1899, may retain their allegiance to the Crown of Spain by declaring their intention so to do prior to the 11th day of April, 1900, thereby remaining subjects of Spain and entitled to American citizenship, if they wish to come to the United States and comply with our laws.

But the Porto Rican can not become a citizen of the United States or any other country in the world, because under this bill he would have no sovereign to renounce. This measure, if enacted, will make him a man without a country. Can any man conceive of a more tyrannical form of government?

I oppose the giving of the power to appoint a legislative body to any official, as it is repugnant to the primitive principle of the Republic. When the people are deprived of the free choice of their legislature, the very life of the government is threatened.

I am opposed to building up a protective wall between the States and Porto Rico. We have given free trade and a more liberal civil government and have extended American citizenship to the Hawaiians. Why not do the same for Porto Rico? They are as well adapted to improve these privileges as the Hawaiian. The foundation of civilization has long since been laid in Porto Rico. They embraced the civilizing Christian religion many years ago. Why nail Porto Rico to the cross?

It is conceded by a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means who favor the tariff feature of this bill that free trade with Porto Rico will in no way affect either the agricultural or industrial interests of the United States.

This is admitted by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. PAYNE], who also said in his speech favoring the passage of the tariff feature of the bill:

> I want to make a precedent that all men can read with reference to the Philippine Islands. And if Cuba should want to come, I want to give notice to Cuba that we propose to protect this industry—
>
> Referring to the beet sugar—
> when it comes to a question of admitting the 1,000,000 tons of sugar that will come from Cuba.

It is evident from the views expressed by the gentleman from New York that avarice and not equity is to govern the action of this House in legislating for our insular possessions if his views prevail.

Therefore, we are to crucify Porto Rico on the cross of 15 per cent taxation without representation, and brand across its breast with irons of avarice, broken faith, and Congressional prerogative the words "Cuba, beware!" that all Cubans may take notice.

Do you intend to establish an Ireland in Porto Rico? If so, you should at least give it as much consideration as Great Britain gave that island. In the days of its greatest oppression, Ireland was treated with far greater consideration by Great Britain than we propose to treat Porto Rico by this bill.

The Irish are subjects of Great Britain, and as such they may renounce its sovereignty and become citizens of the United States. They have representation in Parliament, and are therefore consulted in matters of taxation. Both of these great privileges this bill would deny to the unfortunate people of Porto Rico.

There is no reason for dragging the Philippine Islands into this legislation. We can settle that question when we meet it.

And if the gentlemen are correct in their contention that we are not governed by the Constitution in legislating for our new possessions, it is not necessary to persecute these people in order to establish the prerogative of Congress.

I am opposed to this legislation because it violates the principle for which the Republican party declared, and on which it was carried into power in 1860—equality of all men before the law. You may call this sentiment; but when the love of liberty and equity gives way to commercial avarice, then this glorious Republic will crumble from the earth. I am opposed to this measure because it violates the American sense of justice and equity, and because it would establish the identical condition in Porto Rico that the British Parliament sought to establish in the American colonies over a hundred years ago—taxation without representation. The colonists rebelled against the establishment of this principle, and the great men of that day, both by speech and pen, contended that Parliament had no power or right in equity to pass or enforce such laws. This contention on the part of the colonists culminated in the Declaration of Independence, the war of the Revolution, and finally the establishment of this grand and glorious Republic.

Much has been said in the debate on this measure about the positions occupied by Webster and Calhoun on the constitutionality of a somewhat similar question. I will quote from those who lived before the Constitution, those who made the Constitution possible. And from their views I will show that, regardless of whether or not Congress has the constitutional authority to legislate arbitrarily for Porto Rico, it was never intended by the founders of this Republic to vest in any body, legislative, executive, or judicial, arbitrary power. Hence I contend that under the spirit of the Constitution we have no right to arbitrarily tax the Porto Ricans without representation.

Fortunately for the world, the colonists of the pre-Revolutionary days and their posterity, they had among them men who prized liberty far and away above all things else worth living for. First and foremost among these, says John Adams, was James Otis.

He graduated with honors at Harvard in 1743, and for a year or two afterwards devoted himself to the study of literature, before reading law. In 1760 he began to take an active interest in colonial politics.

When the order came from England directing the issuance of writs of assistance, which would authorize the customs officers to enter any man's house on suspicion of concealment of smuggled goods, Otis was a law officer under the Crown. It was his duty to appear on behalf of the Government. He refused and resigned his office, and appeared for the people against the issuance of the writs.

John Adams, who was present and heard his argument, said:

His plea was profound for its legal lore, fearless in its assertion of the rights of the colonial Englishmen, and so fervid in its eloquence, he was a flame of fire. He breathed the breath of life into the nation. American independence was then and there born. Then and there the child independence was born. In fifteen years—that is, in 1776—he grew up to manhood, and declared himself free.

Bancroft says:

He led the van of American patriots.

Ridpath calls him "The courageous herald who ran swinging a torch in the early dawn of the American Revolution." He says:

He was the prophetic giant of the pre-Revolutionary days.

Of his birth he says:

It was this child that destiny had assigned the heroic work of confronting the aggression of Great Britain on the American colonists and of inspiring the latter to forcible resistance. There can be no doubt that his was the living voice which called to resistance first Boston, then Massachusetts, then New England, then the world; for ultimately the world heard the sound thereof and was glad. The American colonists resisted and at length won their independence. The sparks fell in France, and the jets of flame ran together in a conflagration of light, which was seen over Europe, and, if over Europe, then over the world. The pre-Revolutionist had cried out, and mankind heard him. Resistance to tyranny became an obedience to God.

Soon after his argument against issuance of writs of assistance he was unanimously elected a representative from Boston to the colonial assembly. And he was reelected nearly every year of the remaining active years of his life. His influence at home in controlling and directing the movements which led to the Revolution was universally felt and acknowledged, and abroad no American was so frequently quoted, denounced, or applauded in Parliament and the British press. He was a martyr to American liberty. Attacked in a darkened room in a public coffeehouse in Boston by a mob of tory officeholders, he received injuries from which he never recovered.

Otis published several pamphlets in assertion of the rights of the colonies. The most noted of these pamphlets are, The Natural Rights of the American Colonist, and The Political Rights of the British Colonists Asserted and Proved.

I will apply the principles of Otis (which were the seeds of American liberty) to the contentions of the gentlemen who favor the tariff feature of the Porto Rican bill, which shows by comparison that they are committing themselves to a policy in direct conflict to every theory upon which American independence was asserted and established.

It has been said by gentlemen who favor the tariff between Porto Rico and the United States that these acquisitions are mere dependencies of the United States, and that Congress has not only an inherent but constitutional power to legislate, and also power under the treaties to govern these particular acquisitions as Congress may see fit. If this contention be true, it is against the spirit on which this Government was founded, and is a most dangerous condition if it does exist. The people of this country do not think or intend that Congress has, or shall have, power to legislate for any of our Territories greater than the power given it by the Constitution to legislate for the States. This I hold to be true, whether the territory be newly acquired or otherwise.

I insist if the statement "Congress has arbitrary power to legislate for our Territories" be correct, we should have an amendment to the Constitution limiting the power of Congress to legislate for the Territories to its power within the States, as it is evident from the contention of the gentlemen on the floor of this House that the liberty of the inhabitants of such Territories may frequently depend upon the letter and not the spirit of the Constitution.

Further, if this be the status of the Porto Ricans, it is tantamount to a denial of their natural rights, and a distinct declaration that their life, liberty, and property is at the disposal of the American Congress. This doctrine was rejected by the American colonists, and will never be subscribed to by the people of the United States.

I quote what James Otis, who may rightfully be said to be the parent of American independence, says upon the natural rights of colonists:

The natural liberty of man is to be free from any superior power on earth and not to be under the will or legislative authority of any man, but only to have the law of nature for his rule.

Says Locke:

This is the liberty of independent states; this is the liberty of every man out of society who has a mind to live so; which liberty is only abridged in certain instances, not lost to those who are born in or voluntarily enter into society. This gift of God can not be annihilated. The colonists, being men, have a right to be considered equally entitled to all the rights of nature with the Europeans, and they are not to be restrained in the exercise of any of these rights, but for the evident good of the whole community.

Mr. Speaker, it is not claimed that Porto Ricans are to be deprived of their full rights of American citizenship (to which they are entitled as a matter of good faith) for the good of the whole community, but simply to establish the prerogative of Congress to levy taxes without representation.

I quote further:

By being or becoming members of society they have not renounced their natural liberty in any greater degree than other good citizens. And if it is taken from them without consent, they are so far enslaved. They have an undoubted right to expect that their best good will ever be consulted by their rulers, supreme and subordinate, without any partial views confined to the particular interest of one island or another. Neither the riches of Jamaica nor the luxury of a metropolis should ever have weight enough to break the balance of truth and justice. Truth and faith belong to men as men from men.

Mr. Speaker, we promised the Porto Ricans the rights of American citizenship through the Commander in Chief of our Army, General Miles. And when this pledge was made, you could not have found in the length and breadth of this land one liberty-loving American citizen who took exceptions to it. They have a right to demand that we now keep the faith. "And if they are disappointed in their just expectations of them in one society, they will at least wish for them in another. If the love of truth and justice (the only sound policy in any state) is not strong enough to prevent certain causes from taking place, the arts of fraud and force will not prevent the most fatal effect. In the long run, those who fall on arbitrary measures will meet their deserved fate. It is a clear truth that those who every day barter away other men's liberty will soon care little for their own."

In their report upon the bill to regulate the trade with Porto Rico, a majority of the House Ways and Means Committee, after discussing at length all the constitutional questions bearing upon the proposed legislation, said:

Upon the whole we conclude: First, that, upon reason and authority, the term "United States" as used in the Constitution has reference only to the States that constitute the Federal Union, and does not include Territory; second, that the power of Congress with respect to legislation for the Territories is plenary; third, that under the power Congress may prescribe different rates of duty for Porto Rico from those prescribed for the United States.

In answering these findings I again quote James Otis:

Every British subject born on the continent of America, or in any other of the British dominions, is by the law of God and nature, by the common law, and by act of Parliament (exclusive of all charters from the Crown) entitled to all the natural, essential, inherent, and inseparable rights of our fellow-subjects in Great Britain.

Among these rights are the following, which it is humbly conceived no man or body of men, not excepting the Parliament, justly, equitably, and consistently with their own rights and the constitution can take away.

First. That the supreme and subordinate powers of legislation shall be free and sacred in the hands where the community have once rightfully placed them.

Mr. Speaker, the people expect this supreme legislative body to hold sacred, extend, and defend liberty, the birthright of every person living under the protection of our flag. We should not violate this trust.

Second. The supreme national legislative can not be altered justly till the commonwealth is dissolved, nor a subordinate legislative taken away, without forfeiture or other good cause. Nor then can the subjects in the subordinate government be reduced to a state of slavery and subject to the despotic rule of others. A State has not the right to make slaves of the conquered, even when the subordinate right of the legislative is forfeited and so declared. This can not affect the natural persons, either of those who were invested with it or the inhabitants, so far as to deprive them of the rights of subjects and of men.

Third. No legislative, supreme or subordinate, has a right to make itself arbitrary.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is intended to establish the arbitrary prerogative of Congress by passing this measure.

Fourth. The supreme legislative can not justly assume a power of ruling by extempore arbitrary decrees, but is bound to dispense justice by known settled rules and by duly authorized independent judges.

If we legislate for Porto Rico by settled rules, if we conform to the contention of Otis, we will treat them not as proposed in this bill, but as we treat the people in the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma. Otherwise we violate the primitive principles and take the first step to break down the liberties of which we justly boast so much and which were bought with the best blood of the patriots in '76 and '61.

Fifth. The supreme power can not take away from any man any part of his property without his consent in person or by representation.

Sixth. The legislature can not transfer the power of making laws to other hands.

Mr. Speaker, this bill practically transfers power to make laws to the President by authorizing him to appoint the upper legislative body of the island of Porto Rico.

These are the bounds which by God and nature are fixed. Hitherto have they a right to come and no further. First. To govern by stated laws. Second. These laws should have no other end ultimately but the good of the people. Third. Taxes are not to be laid on the people but by their consent in person or by deputation.

And now Congress proposes to say that Otis and all his compatriots occupied a false position. If the contention of the gentlemen who favor this tariff be right, the fathers were wrong; the pre-Revolutionists and the Revolutionists were an illogical, unjust set of men, and were nothing more or less than a band of brigands, who wrenched from Great Britain her rightful possessions without right or justice. According to this doctrine, while this liberty-loving, God-fearing people have been building up civilization, education, prosperity, and happiness, spreading the doctrine of an extending liberty, we have been living a lie for over a hundred years. It is an acknowledgment, according to this contention, that we emanated from a band of marplots, and we take this opportunity of condemning their acts.

Mr. Speaker, if we have just awakened to the iniquity of the fathers and they were wrong in their contention of no taxation without representation (and if the contention of these gentlemen is right, the fathers must have been wrong), we are in possession of that which does not belong to us. Therefore it is our plain duty, as a civilized, just, and righteous people, to turn back to Great Britain all the territory possessed by the United States (as it is fair to assume we would have expanded under British rule) and restore it to control as the rightful sovereign power. This weak and ridiculous doctrine, I am sure, will never be subscribed to by the American people.

Fourth. Their whole power is not transferable.

These are the first principles of law and justice, and the great barrier of a free state and of the British constitution in particular.

Suppose a time may come when, instead of a process at common law, the Parliament shall give a decisive blow to every charter in America and declare them all void. Nay, it shall also be granted that it is barely possible that the time may come when the real interest of the whole may require an act of Parliament to annihilate all these charters. What could follow from all this that would shake one of the essential, natural, civil, or religious rights of the colonies? Nothing. They would be men, citizens, and British subjects, after all. No act of Parliament can deprive them of the liberties of such, unless they will contend that an act of Parliament can make slaves of not only one but two million of the Commonwealth. And if so, why not the whole?

Why not, as Otis asks, make Porto Ricans slaves if your contention be true that you can rule as you please and the Constitution does not govern you in making laws for Porto Rico? If you can lay this tax without their consent, you can pass such laws as you please.

I do not think the American people believe you have or shall have such arbitrary power. But if Congress has this power, it should be shorn of it at once. It is too great a temptation to anybody and is contrary to what the fathers intended when they laid the foundation of this Government.

I quote further:

The very act of taxing, exercised over those who are not represented, appears to me to be depriving them of one of their essential rights as freemen; and if continued, seems to be in effect an entire disfranchisement of every civil right. For what one civil right is worth a rush after a man's property is subject to be taken away from him at pleasure without his consent? If a man is not his assessor in person or by deputy, his liberty is gone or lies entirely at the mercy of others.

It would seem the Omnipotent put these words into the mouth of this bearer of light to give warning to those urging the passage of this particular measure.

In what way can gentlemen who contend that liberty is only for people living within the confines of the United States answer the logic of Otis?

I think I have heard it said—

He continues—

that when the Dutch are asked why they enslave their colonies their answer is that the liberty of the Dutchmen is confined to Holland, and that it was never intended for provincials in America or anywhere else. A sentiment, this, very worthy of modern Dutchmen, but if their brave and worthy ancestors had entertained such narrow ideas of liberty, seven poor and distressed provinces would never have asserted their rights as against the whole Spanish Monarchy, of which the present is but a shadow. It is to be hoped none of our fellow-subjects of Great Britain, great or small, have borrowed this Dutch maxim of plantation politics. If they have, they had better return it from whence it came; indeed they had. Modern Dutch or French maxims of state never will suit with a British constitution.

Apply these thoughts to the present case. If Otis were here himself he could not more completely answer the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], "Liberty is not the same at all times and in all places."

There is but one kind of liberty for freemen. I am aware it is not always admitted, but it is truth that can never be annihilated. It is thus that Otis, in his celebrated pamphlet on The Rights of the British Colonists Asserted and Proved, defined what the political rights of the colonists were:

Though it be allowed that liberty may be enjoyed in a comfortable measure where prohibitions are laid on the trade of a kingdom or province, yet if taxes are laid on either without consent they can not be said to be free. This barrier of liberty once broken down, all is lost. If a shilling in the pound may be taken away from me against my will, why not twenty shillings? And if so, why not my life and my liberty?

Mr. Speaker, this is what Otis would have answered to your statement, "That all money collected under this bill will go back to the Porto Ricans."

Otis says further: "Merchants were always particularly favored by the common law. All merchants, except enemies, may safely come to England with their goods and merchandise. And why not as well to the plantations? Are they not entitled to all the British privileges? No; they must be confined, in their imports and exports, to the good of the metropolis." The foregoing British contention is one of the arguments made in favor of this measure. "Very well, we have submitted to this. The act of navigation is a good one, so are all that exclude manufacturers from the plantations; and every honest man will readily subscribe to them. But to promote the manufactures of England, it is thought best to shut up the colonies, in a manner, from all the world. Right as to Europe, but, for God's sake, must we have no trade with other colonies?"

Mr. Speaker, this is the question that the people are asking Congress to-day. Are we not to have free trade with Porto Rico?

Otis contends further: "In some cases the trade between British colony and colony is prohibited, as in wool, etc. Granting all this to be right, is it not enough? No; duties and taxes must be paid without any consent or representation in Parliament."

"In the reign of Edward III, the Black Prince of Wales, having Aquitain granted to him, did lay an imposition or fuage or focage a foco upon the subjects of that dukedom, namely, a shilling for every fire, called hearth silver, which was of so great discontent and odious to them that it made them revolt, and nothing since this time has been imposed, by pretext of any prerogative, upon merchandise imported into or exported out of this realm, until Queen Mary's time, nor anything of that kind taken place since the Revolution. King Charles, his ship money, every one has heard of."

"It may be said that these authorities will not serve the colonists, because the duties laid on them are by Parliament. I acknowledge the difference of fact, but can not see great difference in equity, while the colonists are not represented in the House of Commons. And therefore, with all humble deference, I apprehend that till the colonists are represented the spirit of all these authorities will argue strongly in their favor."

"When Mr. Dummer wrote his defense of the charters there was talk of taking them away by act of Parliament. His third proposition is that 'It is not for the interest of the Crown to resume the charters if forfeited.' This he proves, as also that it would be more for the interest of Great Britain to enlarge rather than diminish the privileges of the colonists. His last proposition is that 'It seems inconsistent with justice to disfranchise the charter colonies by act of Parliament.'"

"It seems, therefore," says he, "a severity without a precedent, that a people who have the misfortune of being a thousand leagues from their sovereign (a misfortune great enough in itself) should unsummoned, unheard, in one day, be deprived of their valuable privileges, which they and their fathers have enjoyed for near one hundred years."

"It is true," as he observes, "the legislative power is absolute and unaccountable, and kings, lords, and commons may do what they please. But the question here is not about power, but about right—or rather equity—and shall not the supreme judicature of all the nation do right?"

"One may say that what the Parliament can not do justly, they can not do at all. The higher the power is, the greater the caution is to be used in the execution of it; because the sufferer is helpless and without resort."

"But, if it is thought hard that charter privileges should be taken away by act of Parliament, is it not much harder to be in part or in whole disfranchised of rights that have been always thought inherent to a British subject, namely, to be free from all taxes but what he consents to in person or by his representative? This right, if it could be traced no higher than Magna Charta, is a part of the common law, part of a British subject's birthright, and as inherent and as perpetual as the duty of allegiance, both of which have been brought to these colonies and hitherto held sacred and inviolable, and I hope and trust ever will."

"It is humbly conceived that the British colonists (except only the conquered, if any) are by Magna Charta, as well entitled to have a voice in their taxes as the subjects within the realm. Are we not as really deprived of that right by the Parliament assessing us before we are represented in the House of Commons as if the King should do it by his prerogative?"

"I conceive the British constitution must make an exception of all taxes until it is thought fit to unite a dominion to the realm. Such taxation must be considered either as uniting the dominion to the realm or disfranchising them. If they are united, they will be entitled to representation as well as Wales. If they are taxed without a union or representation, they are so far disfranchised."

"The sum of my argument is that civil government is of God; that the administrators of it were originally the whole people; that they might have devolved it upon whom they pleased; that this devolution is fiduciary for the good of the whole; that by the British constitution this devolution is on the kings, lords, and commons—the supreme, sacred, and uncontrollable legislative power, not only in the realm, but through the dominion; that by abdication the original contract was broken to pieces; that by the Revolution it was renewed and more firmly established, and the rights and liberties of the subjects in all parts of the dominions more fully explained and confirmed; that in consequence of this establishment and the acts of succession and union His Majesty George III is rightful king and sovereign, and with his Parliament the supreme legislative of Great Britain and the dominions thereto belonging; that this constitution is the most free one and far the best now existing on earth; that by this constitution every man is a free man; that no part of His Majesty's dominions can be taxed without their consent; that every part has a right to be represented in the supreme or some subordinate legislature; that the refusal of this would seem to be a contradiction of practice, to the theory of the constitution; that the colonies are subordinate dominions, and are now in such a state to make it best for the good of the whole that they should not only be continued in the enjoyment of subordinate legislation, but be also represented in some proportion to their numbers and estates in this grand legislature of the nation; that this would unite all parts of the British Empire in the greatest peace and prosperity, and render it invulnerable and perpetual."

The attitude of gentlemen favoring this tariff will, if passed, place the United States toward Porto Rico, as shown by the eminent authority which I have just quoted, exactly in the attitude which Great Britain assumed to the American colonists and which caused them to rebel and by force of arms establish their independence.

Mr. Speaker, the elemental principles of American liberty having been set forth for us with such clearness and force that no intelligent man can fail to comprehend them, and it being perfectly clear, as it must be to the reasonable and unprejudiced mind, that the legislation now proposed for Porto Rico is essentially incompatible with and repugnant to those principles, the question for us now to consider as Americans and lovers of our country is whether or not it is best for the nation to remain true to its republican principles or abandon them for the policy of empire.

There is no hesitancy or doubt in my mind as to which should be our choice. I believe in adherence to our primitive principles. I stand for the perpetuity of the institutions which have made us blessed beyond any nation on earth; which have wrought for us, even before we have passed the stage of national adolescence, a prosperity and development at which the whole world marvels.

Change is essential to progress. A country which does not grow must decay. I welcomed with delight the acquisition of Porto Rico. I favor the retention of the Philippines. But in advocating the extension of our territory, the spirit which moved me was not the spirit of avarice, the spirit of commercial exploitation, but the spirit of seventy-six, the spirit of sixty-one, and the spirit of ninety-eight, the spirit of liberty, the spirit which sympathizes with the oppressed of the world, which hopes to see the tyrant's shackles broken from all mankind.

Wherever the American flag can go honorably and virtuously, wherever it can mean to a people what it means to us, there I want to see it go. But if it means less in Porto Rico than it means in Illinois, it were far better for us as well as the Porto Ricans that it had never gone there. Remember the words of the father of American liberty, "It is a clear truth that those who every day barter away other men's liberty will soon care little for their own."

In his able work on Democracy and Social Growth in America, Prof. Bernard Moses, whom the President has just honored with an appointment as member of the Philippine Commission, lays down this proposition: "If the nation would be true to itself throughout its changes of governmental forms, growth must continue on the basis of essential and fundamental ideas. Like a religious system, it must seek to keep its primitive principles conspicuous; and if at any time they are lost to sight, the nation must be awakened by the preaching of a revival."

Mr. Speaker, I think we have reached the crisis in our history; I think we need a liberty revival. If we are true to ourselves, we must have it. If we are to be untrue, then the ultimate penalty will be dissolution of our republican institutions.

A nation which surrenders its basic principles can not survive. I am not an alarmist. I do not think the dissolution will come in our day or generation; such changes work slowly, but they are none the less inevitable. I doubt not that as imperialists we will have our day of grandeur, and perhaps our imperial splendor will eclipse that of ancient Rome.

Columbia, if shamefully bedecked with the precious Pearl of the Antilles and the gems of the Pacific and the Orient, may excite for a time such admiration as is won by riches and voluptuousness. But, sir, the light of liberty, which is to her what virtue is to woman, will have faded from her eye; and all the riches of the world can not make up for that loss to those who really love her, to those who look upon her starry emblem as the symbol of God-given rights and not as a commercial asset.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I have five minutes remaining, have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will yield to the gentleman one minute, making it five minutes.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, it may be well to consider for a moment the course of events since this bill first came into the House. The Committee on Ways and Means, of which I have the honor to be a member, apparently misconstruing the message of the President, voted to impose a "plain duty" of 25 per cent of our existing rates. That duty has been reduced to 15 per cent. Instead of being permanent in form, it is self-repealing inside of two years, and may be repealed by the Territorial legislature in two months. The need of immediate revenue has been supplied by the appropriation of $2,000,000. So much, Mr. Speaker, for what has been conceded with reference to the issue of the tariff.

When we consider the arguments that were advanced in support of the measure as it was first presented here and compare it with the constitutional situation to-day, we find an equally great change. The bill was predicated upon the proposition that Congress was acting under general powers of sovereignty outside of the Constitution and was subject to no limitations whatever excepting that in the amendment relating to slavery. It may have occurred to you as it has to me, that the speeches recently delivered in the debate here and elsewhere seek to bring this duty strictly under the terms of the Constitution, and it is now maintained that it is constitutional.

Some of my colleagues who do not agree with me have, for purely ad captandum purposes, decorated the doctrine which I have asserted here with the name of John C. Calhoun. I have disputed the assertion of despotic power on the part of Congress. The doctrine of constitutional limitation upon the power of Congress is the doctrine of every justice who has spoken upon that subject from our Supreme Court. I assert here in the presence of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who to-day made a contrary assertion, that it is the doctrine of the Republican platforms of 1856 and of 1860, and it is the doctrine of Abraham Lincoln.

The platform of 1856 declared, with reference to the fifth amendment to the Constitution, that—

> It becomes our duty to maintain this provision of the Constitution against all attempts to violate it for the purpose of establishing slavery in the United States by positive legislation prohibiting its existence or extension therein; that we deny the authority of Congress, of a Territorial legislature, or any individual or association of individuals to give legal existence to slavery in any Territory of the United States while the present Constitution shall be maintained.

The platform of 1860 made substantially the same declaration in almost the same terms.

But, Mr. Speaker, a new authority has recently appeared, and I think this doctrine can now be decorated with another name, the name of a man whom I have often followed with great pleasure, and I take the liberty here of christening it the Grosvenor doctrine. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I will now read from a speech delivered by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, printed in the RECORD of March 26, in which he says:

> We say Congress may legislate in relation to these territories without any reference to the provisions of the Constitution, excepting that Congress can not do a thing forbidden by the Constitution. To illustrate, we admit that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" nor can it pass any law "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," nor forbidding the people "peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances;" nor can it quarter soldiers upon the owner of property in time of peace, nor prevent the people from bearing arms, nor shall it involve the homes of people in the matter of searching for papers, etc.

Mr. Speaker, that is utterly inconsistent with the "free hand" theory, the extraconstitutional, general sovereignty theory, the theory that Congress has despotic power over the Territories; that is precisely the doctrine that I have contended for. I have not asserted that the Constitution goes to Porto Rico with any great Latin name, but I have asserted that it was in force upon Capitol Hill and that Congress could do nothing which it was forbidden by that instrument from doing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we see how much has been conceded, and it seems to me that the leaders upon this side of the House, instead of clinging to the miserable remnant of this business, might well exhibit that nobler courage which would reform their policy altogether and grant free trade, as the President recommended, to Porto Rico. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The situation is precisely parallel with the situation in 1774.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. McCALL. In 1774 it was proposed by King George's Government to repeal the solitary remnant of the taxes upon the American colonies. Five-sixths of those taxes, upon one pretext or another, had been repealed. The ministry, in order to support the preamble of that act that it was expedient to tax America for the benefit of America—and you make parade here of our display of virtue in imposing this tax for the benefit of Porto Rico—maintained the small tax of 3 pence upon tea. Upon one pretext and another they had repealed nearly all the tax, but they retained enough to flaunt their asserted right to tax, and they brought on the Revolution.

Edmund Burke, in pointing out the method in which the repeal had been brought about, said that it was pilfered by piecemeal, and that the ministers invented some miserable tale of the day in order meanly to sneak out of difficulties into which they had proudly strutted. I do not impute this method to my colleagues, but I do assert that upon the main issue there is a precise resemblance, and that you retain this wretched shadow of a tax simply to assert your power to tax those unrepresented people according to your own sweet will. This assertion it is, Mr. Speaker, that has aroused not Porto Rico, but the people of this nation, that has made one great "Boston tea party" of the whole country; that has touched the generous sentiment of the American people, a sentiment that can not find room enough to express itself between the two great oceans. The only fitting response you can make to that sentiment is to grant free trade to Porto Rico. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

There are weighty reasons for not concurring in the civil-government amendments of the Senate. The chief governing body for that island is to be the council of eleven, every one of whom is to be appointed by the President. We are making but a sorry beginning, I fear, at colonial government, if what is said about this feature be true by the members of the House insular committee, who were appointed to consider this subject.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

[Mr. SWANSON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS].

[Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PAYNE. I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, when I closed the remarks that I made on the proposed rule, I was criticised by my friends around me for having used the term "subsidized Republican press." I denied at the time that I had used the term, for no such purpose was in my mind. [Derisive cries on the Democratic side.] Oh, gentlemen, any man may make a mistake of a word in the heat of debate. I did not intend to use any such term. The term I intended to use was "misguided." I find, however, that the criticism is confirmed by the report furnished me by the reporter, and I want to make as public an explanation as the charge which I made without intention was public.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there left?

The SPEAKER. Forty minutes remain to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and nine to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RHEA].

[Mr. RHEA of Kentucky addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I am very much gratified indeed that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] addressed the House to-day, for in the course of his remarks he clearly set forth the position of the President on this bill, saying that the President is united with his party in the support of it. I read from the remarks to-day of the gentleman from Indiana, as given by the stenographic report I have now in my hands, in which he says:

And, Mr. Speaker, as the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has so well said, that illusion should be at once dispelled from the public mind, because it is known that the President of this Republic, the members of his official family, the leaders of the great Republican party here and elsewhere, are to-day united in the support of this measure.

In December last, in his regular annual message, the President said "our plain duty" was to give free trade to Porto Rico. The President, in a sub rosa way, has told the leaders of his party that he has changed; but, Mr. Speaker, he has not risen to the dignity of the statesman he should be and given to Congress, as the Constitution requires him to do "from time to time," in a message, the reasons for his change, but has contented himself with whispering it around to members of the Republican party.

I should like to say more on this line, but my time is too brief. I want to read a paragraph or two which shows the somersault of the distinguished young gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] on this question. In an interview, undisputed, published in a Republican paper, the Indianapolis Journal of March 6, that gentleman says:

I voted for the bill at the earnest solicitation of President McKinley and the leaders of the Republican party, simply as an emergency measure. * * * I never said at any time that I would join the Democracy and vote against the bill, but I did say that I would vote against and fight the bill in the Republican caucus, and I did.

Now listen particularly to this language.

I subordinated my own personal views as to the expediency of the passage of such a bill and voted for it in the interest of party harmony and to sustain the Administration.

The gentleman wanted to do his "plain duty"—give Porto Rico free trade, her just and legal rights—but forsook his "plain duty" for "party harmony and to sustain the Administration." He does not state that at that time, last March, there was any new evidence or meritorious reasons for his change or the change of the President from "our plain duty" policy. Think of it, gentlemen! "Party harmony" above "plain duty!" The "Administration" support above supporting the Constitution! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But to prop up this causeless change from free trade to a protective tariff he quotes to-day, for the first time, from a letter from Governor-General Davis, written a week ago, he says—that is, a month after the joint change of himself and President. I have read the letter, which I find in part in the stenographic report of his speech to-day. It nowhere says that the President or the American Congress should abandon our "plain duty," but, in brief, that we would get no revenue under free trade; which Governor Davis and the President, Mr. Secretary Root, and the gentleman himself knew when they started last fall "our plain duty policy" of free access between Porto Rico and the United States. It is too late to give any such excuse for such a sleeveless change of front.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana has the nerve to rise here to-day, with a self-assumed purity of an angel, and criticises the Democratic party and the five or six patriots on that side of the House because they have kept the faith, who are determined to do their plain duty to these people, to our Constitution and its immutable principles. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But to another point along another line. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] a few moments ago undertook to apologize to the "Republican press" for denouncing the Republican press this morning as being "subsidized," simply because the press of this country have turned their powerful guns upon the cowardly acts in this matter of the Administration and the Republican party in abandoning "our plain duty" with these islands, because the press, with great effect, is supporting the Democrats in their efforts to uphold the Constitution, the purity of American honor, and deal out justice to a poor people who came willingly under our flag! [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, under the rule I extend my remarks by printing the great paper of Judge Brewer in opposing a "colonial policy," which this bill inaugurates.

THE SPANISH WAR—A PROPHECY OR AN EXCEPTION.

[By the Hon. David J. Brewer, associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.]

MR. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN OF THE LIBERAL CLUB: On the 16th day of April, 1898, Congress, by an overwhelming vote, passed this resolution:

"Joint resolution for the recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba, demanding that the Government of Spain relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and to withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters, and directing the President of the United States to use the land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

"Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating, as they have, in the destruction of a United States battle ship, with 265 of its officers and crew, while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Habana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

"Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled—

"First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

"Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

"Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

"Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island, except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

"Approved April 20, 1898."

This was the official declaration by the nation of its purpose in commencing the recent war. If thereupon Spain had withdrawn its troops from Cuba and left the people of the island free to establish their own government, there would have been no war. And when, as the result of the conflict, Spain relinquished all dominion and control of Cuba and left her people free, the purpose of the war was accomplished.

It were going too far to say that the philanthropic motive of emancipating Cuba was the sole cause of the war. Other matters tended more or less directly to precipitate the collision. Cuba had been for years in a state of chronic disturbance. Its unsettled condition had seriously interfered with our commercial relations with the island and pecuniarily damaged our interests. The fearful catastrophe of the destruction of the Maine intensified an already growing feeling. The cool, dispassionate statement of Senator PROCTOR, reciting the horrors which he had seen, more potent than all the tempestuous utterances of those jingo orators who shouted for war, but never enlisted, strengthened the conviction that something ought to be done. And then the varied interests which always hope to profit either pecuniarily or in the line of military or naval glory by any war kept steadily working toward the same result.

Yet, while all these matters are to be taken into account in determining the causes of the war, the fact remains that the main thought—the officially declared purpose—was the relief of an oppressed people. And that purpose ought never to be forgotten. Whether facts were distorted, cruelties exaggerated, the real conditions misrepresented, whether, indeed, the emergency had arisen which called for interference, are matters which may be disputed and debated, but it should never be forgotten that the American people believed that the emergency had arisen, that humanity demanded interference, and undertook the war to put an end to cruelty and wrong and for the emancipation of a struggling and downtrodden people.

When the war had commenced it was waged as other wars, and this country struck where it could and as hard as it could. We aimed at the solar plexus, and we hit it. The proud Castilian Corbett went down, and victory is ours.

Out of this war have sprung questions affecting the future history and policy of this country, questions condensed in that which I have selected as the title of this talk: "The War with Spain; a Prophecy or an Exception?" The questions which I wish to notice are two in number, and may be stated thus: First, because we undertook the deliverance of the oppressed Cubans from the domination of Spain, are we hereafter to assume the duty of forcibly emancipating all oppressed peoples, or were the circumstances surrounding our interference in Cuban affairs such as to make that simply an exception in our history and policy? Secondly, are we to extend our dominion by force, purchase, or otherwise over remote territory and enter upon that career of colonial expansion which has become the settled habit of the great European nations, or are we to remain content with our compact continental possessions and devote our energies to the development of our own resources and the building up of the United States of America within those limits along the lines of our past history?

The questions thus presented are vital and far-reaching. They are not to be settled dogmatically; by epithet or by denunciation; not by saying that what has been must be, and that changed conditions bring no change in duty or policy; nor, on the other hand, that because we are powerful and can do so, it is destiny and duty that we should. Cant phrases do not change convictions or determine right, and the American people are not ruled by an epigram. Fortunately these questions are being discussed without reference to party lines, and in the most earnest, patriotic, and thoughtful manner by all.

Returning to the first question, it must be noticed that if the circumstances demanded any outside interference in the affairs of Cuba (and that they did the general consensus of opinion in this country asserted), then we were so situated that it would seem to have been our special duty to interfere; we were the near Samaritan. I know there are some who say that there is no duty of a nation as of an individual to act the part of a Samaritan; that a nation, although an aggregation of individuals, is somehow or other relieved of all obligations which rest upon an individual; that it is not only its privilege, but its duty, to be guided in all respects by selfishness; that no matter what cry of appeal may come from far or near, it is the nation's right to measure its duty, not by any questions of humanity, but by the mere rule of dollars and cents. To those who entertain such views of national right and duty any interference for the mere sake of relieving an oppressed people is necessarily an exception—one to be discountenanced and never followed.

I do not agree with those views. A nation is, in my judgment, a great moral entity, expressing in its life the sum of all the moral obligations which rest upon its individual citizens, and so there are times in the history of every nation when humanity calls upon it to look beyond the mere matter of dollars and cents, and even at personal sacrifice to interfere in the affairs of other nations. And yet, because this national duty may sometimes arise, and when it arises should always be bravely met, it does not follow therefrom that there is a continuous obligation to be looking into the affairs of other nations to see if there are not wrongs that ought to be righted, oppressed that should be delivered, and struggling people set free.

The good Samaritan did not go down on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho hunting a job, but as he journeyed on his own business came where the robbed and beaten sufferer lay. It is not mere selfishness which declares that the primary duty of a nation is to its own people and that their interests and well-being are not to be neglected under the illusive notion that it has a duty to pose as a great national rectifier of wrongs done by other nations. It is a wise man that successfully manages his own household, that has primary regard for the well-being of its inmates, and, although he may not selfishly ignore the condition of affairs of other households, yet he ought always to remember his primary duty and be cautious about interfering in the affairs of others. Everyone knows that a man who is a busybody in other people's affairs, although animated by the best of motives, is as apt to do harm as good. He often fails to appreciate the real situation, interferes in behalf of the wrong party, or interferes when interference is a curse; and the same is true of nations.

Neither is there anything in the so-called "Monroe doctrine" which makes us sponsor for this continent. We have no supervision or control over the internal affairs of other States; we are not their guardians. Each of them has the same right to interfere in the affairs of the United States that we have to interfere in its. That doctrine finds its expression in the message of President Monroe to Congress on December 2, 1823, which, after referring to the difference between the political system which obtains across the waters and that of this country, states the right which we claim in these words:

"We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States."

This means only that we are unwilling that the political system of Europe shall be extended in America. We pledge nointerference with existing colonies of European governments; we simply state that their ideas of government and colonial expansion must not be worked out on this hemisphere.

Whether this doctrine has been so far approved as to become a rule of international law is one thing; it may simply have been acquiesced in because of no suitable occasion for challenge. At best it is but an expression, not of authority over this continent, but simply of protection and defense. It is a declaration of a purpose to stand by our weaker neighbors in case of attack and in no sense an assumption of a control over their affairs.

Neither have we since that message enlarged its scope. When Great Britain demanded reparation from Nicaragua and threatened force to compel compliance, we did not interfere. In the controversy between Venezuela and Great Britain we took no new position. The former Government claimed that the latter was trying to enlarge its territory wrongfully and forcibly by taking possession of that which rightfully belonged to Venezuela. We interfered only so far as to say that Great Britain should not forcibly extend its colonial possessions; and the outcome has been an arbitration between the two nations for the purpose of settling the question of right.

But the second question is of more importance, for I think it may be safely assumed that there is in the American people such a spirit of humanity and sense of responsibility that whenever there shall arise a real emergency for interference in the name of humanity in the affairs of another nation we shall respond with alacrity, and there is also such a general prudence and caution as will keep us from unwarranted and needless interference. And this second question is one whose solution will materially affect our destiny. Happily, the war with Spain is ended and the results of the war determined. Grim-visaged war hath smoothed its wrinkled front.

As there were some who doubted in the beginning its wisdom or necessity, so there are some who doubt whether the results will be beneficial, and whether it was wise to take the territory which the nation has taken. But the thing is accomplished, and it is no part of a patriot to stand aloof and simply denounce. Rather let him accept that which has been accomplished and apply himself as best he may to make the things accomplished fruitful of the least injury and productive of the most blessing. Yet, while so doing, it is right and wise to consider what shall be the future, and whether that which has been done shall become the fixed habit and settled policy of the nation. What has been done is one thing. What shall be is another. We have taken islands separated from us by the waters of the ocean. Are we to thus continually expand? Is such a policy of expansion wise?

In criticising this policy I shall consider only the Philippines. I take them as illustrations because the truth is better seen by its connection with a concrete fact than through any mere general statement. And if I refer only to the arguments against the appropriation of those islands, and fail to notice the many reasons or the peculiar circumstances which induced the action of our Government, it is not because I do not appreciate the force of these reasons and circumstances, but because, as I said, I am not here to complain of that which has been done. I despise a man who simply sulks and swears. My thought is, accepting that which has been done as having been the best under the circumstances, is that to become the future policy of the nation? Is it a prophecy or an exception?

One thing which seemed to attract much attention, and was claimed to justify the taking possession of distant islands, is the need of coaling stations. When the question of annexing Hawaii was pending, distinguished officers of both the Army and Navy appeared before committees of Congress, urging the necessity of securing a coaling station on those islands, and argued that we had better take the entire territory, which was small, and thus avoid the possibility of any other nation securing a post and base of operations contiguous to our own. Now, I do not propose to question the wisdom from a military standpoint of the advice given by those officers. I am ready to accept their statement that in case of war a coaling station there, or at the Philippine Islands, or elsewhere, is of value.

I have had no military education; I do not know how to conduct a war; I do not edit a "yellow" journal; and so I yield unquestioning assent to the claims made by these Army and Navy gentlemen that, in case of war, coaling stations in different parts of the globe are desirable. And yet, with the incredulity and questioning spirit of a Yankee, I can not but notice that we have gotten along safely for an hundred years without any coaling stations outside of our own territory, and I want to ask how much greater victory Dewey would have won if we had had a dozen coaling stations in the far Pacific? And, further, it is clear that for a coaling station territory as large as New England is not essential. I know of but one place that needs such a large coaling station, and that is a place we all hope to eternally avoid. But, beyond that, is there not such a thing as overdoing this getting ready for war? I have noticed that a man who goes about with a chip on his shoulder is very apt to have many quarrels, but the gentleman who minds his own business is ordinarily let alone and goes through life without a fight.

Not that I believe in tamely submitting to every injury or insult, or that a nation, like an individual, does not sometimes have to assert itself, even to the extent of war. No more sacred duty rests upon the United States than to see that every citizen is protected, wherever he may be, and to secure such protection every dollar and every man within the limits of this country should stand pledged. I care not where an American may go, whether among the savage tribes in Africa, among the semicivilized nations of Asia, or in the higher civilized nations of Europe, it should be understood that the banner we love is a guaranty of safety which no nation or individual can trifle with.

It is said that the lives and property of American citizens in Turkey have been wantonly destroyed. If that be true, reparation should be demanded. And if that be refused, I would introduce Dewey to the Sultan before breakfast. And if beneath the fire of his guns the grand dome of the Mosque of St. Sofia tumbles into ruins, with all the picturesque splendor that attended the falling walls of the Temple of Jerusalem, I should only say, let all the world take warning and respect the Stars and Stripes. It is to the glory of this country that in its infancy it refused to pay tribute to the pirates of Algiers, and sent Decatur and others, who vanquished the pirates and compelled respect to our flag. And I care not how often, if necessary, that lesson of the sanctity of the Stars and Stripes is given.

Many plans are suggested for the disposal of the Philippines. One is to withdraw our Army and Navy and leave the inhabitants to do the best they can for themselves. Another is to continue an armed force in possession for the purpose of preserving order until such time as the inhabitants have organized and put into active operation something like a stable government. Third, while leaving the control of internal affairs to the inhabitants, to establish something in the nature of a protectorate—one that will guarantee peace within and protect against invasion from without. Fourth, to treat the islands as so much property and sell them for what we can get—selling to any responsible purchaser and one likely to establish good government in the islands. Fifth, to make them colonies, to be governed by the United States, thus introducing into the life of this nation the colonial system which obtains among the European powers. And sixth, to incorporate these islands as fellow-citizens, establishing therein at first territories with the view of subsequent admission into the Union as States.

All these plans have their advocates. The air is full of argument advocating and challenging the wisdom, legality, and constitutionality of each. I do not propose to enter into any discussion of the legality or constitutionality of any of these plans. I assume that whatever the American people determine to do in reference to these islands they will. If new laws have to be enacted or constitutions amended, all is within the power of the people, for laws and constitutions, legislators, Presidents, and judges are but the means and agents by which the American people put into execution their deliberate purpose, and whatever that people determine to do they will do, and there is no power on earth that will or can stop them. Neither do I propose to say aught for or against the advisability of either of the first four plans suggested.

The only matters I desire to consider are those involved in the last two propositions, namely, the introduction of the colonial system into this country and the holding of these islands as colonies of the United States, or, on the other hand, the incorporation of the people of those islands into our nationality as citizens thereof, either by their direct admission as States or through the intermediate process of Territorial organization. Each of those propositions I believe freighted with peril, and I am glad that the determination has been made to hold those questions open for deliberate consideration and not by hasty action to do that which, once done, might prove to be of lasting and irretrievable injury.

And, first, of the colonial system. Confessedly it will be a departure in the history of this country—an as yet untried experiment. It is said that the Anglo-Saxon race has manifested a capacity to govern well; that we are of that race, and that, therefore, we could well govern those islands as colonies. India and Egypt are pointed to with pride as the achievements of our race in the way of government. I do not question the capacity of the race on either side of the waters to well and wisely govern others. I object to it because it antagonizes the principles upon which this Government was founded, which have controlled its life up to the present time, and the perfection of which has been the hope and aspiration of every true American. Those principles were expressed in the Declaration of Independence in these words:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Upon these immortal principles this Government was established, and we have again and again proclaimed to the world that they are the foundations upon which this Government rests, and have appealed to our prosperity and success as evidence of the justice of those principles. Somehow or other I still believe in the Declaration of Independence, and do not take kindly to a statement like the following in the September number of the Boston Congregationalist:

"The Rev. W. T. Perrin, one of the ablest of the Methodist clergymen of Boston, defended the annexation of Porto Rico, Hawaii, and any other Spanish possessions, holding that the people of the country are realizing the absurdity of the clause in the Declaration of Independence which says that government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. * * * The logic of events has made it our duty to do so, and duty is greater than theory. Government derives its powers from God, and God alone, and the nations are responsible to him."

This assumption of divine authority has been the cry of every despot from Louis XIV, who said, "I am the State," to that madcap on the German throne, who is credited with saying, "Me und Gott." But with a diviner insight and a truer reverence we have believed that government derives its powers from the governed. I glory in the fact that my father was an old-line abolitionist, and one thing which he instilled into my youthful soul was the conviction that liberty, personal and political, is the God-given right of every individual, and I expect to live and die in that faith.

I know that a Massachusetts lawyer years ago sneered at the Declaration of Independence as a collection of glittering generalities, but it takes the audacity of a Boston preacher to say in effect that the Declaration is a lie. It is true that during the century and a quarter of our existence our conduct has not been always on the plane of our avowed principles. Very few nations, as very few individuals, live up to their high ideals; but surely this has been the ideal of our life, and we have striven to make it more and more real. The great war between the States was but an effort to make those principles more far-reaching in their application, and every step forward along our history has been toward a more perfect realization of this ideal.

Now, government by force is the very antipodes of this, and to introduce government by force over any portion of the nation is to start the second quarter of the second century of our life upon principles which are the exact opposite of those upon which we have hitherto lived. It is one thing to fail of reaching your ideal; it is an entirely different thing to deliberately turn your back upon it. It is doubtless true that government by force often secures order and peace, but order and pence are not the only purpose of government. Order reigned at Warsaw. The test of government is not in the outward mechanical display of order, but in the capacity to develop the best men, and we have lived in the faith that government by the consent of the governed develops the best men. We have not let the wise rule the ignorant, the learned the unlearned, the rich the poor, but we have appealed always to those whom Abraham Lincoln called "the plain people" as the ones in whose judgment to rely and upon whose shoulders should rest the burden of government.

Ideas are, after all, the eternal forces. Human life and destiny are controlled by them. They may seem to-day of little significance, but around them gather material interests and to-morrow their power is disclosed.

It is a universal law that no family or nation will prosper whose foundation ideas are not harmonious and consistent. If conflicting, there is nothing more certain than that trouble will follow. Our own history furnishes a tremendous lesson in this direction. We commenced our national life declaring, as its foundation principle, that all men were created equal; that they possessed inalienable rights—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. But we tolerated a conflicting thought. We attempted to limit our foundation principle to white men and deny it to black. It was a compromise. It seemed a small matter. The antagonism would disappear with time. But we forgot that ideas are living forces.

William H. Seward divined the whole situation when he affirmed an "irrepressible conflict." Abraham Lincoln saw the inevitable struggle when he declared that this nation could not endure half slave and half free. And after nearly a century we paid the penalty in the awful sacrifice of the civil war.

Shall we forget the lesson of the past? Shall we say it is a trifling matter to introduce into the life of this nation, which affirms that government derives all its powers from the consent of the governed, the thought that that is true of only one race and not of all? That the consent of the governed may be recognized for one portion and one race and repudiated for another portion and another race within the same dominion?

Government by consent and government by force, no matter how well the government may be administered, are two essentially antagonistic principles. Doubtless no immediate conflict will follow. We may see a large measure of prosperity; but are we not sowing the seeds which in the days to come will grow up into a harvest of trouble for our children and our children's children?

The possibility is not changed by the unquestioned fact that the Anglo-Saxon race has the capacity for governing other races, nor by the singular prosperity which has attended England in her colonial system. In comparing the two nations it must be remembered that England's colonial system commenced when the king was one in fact as well as in name.

The consent of the governed was only a little factor in English life when she first reached out her hand to subdue and control other races. It was no more for the king to govern Canada and India than it was for him to govern England; and, while the consent of the governed has been struggling and growing in England, it has not even yet become the single, dominant, controlling fact of that nation's life; so that the antagonism between the two ideas of government by consent and government by force has never, in that empire, been fully developed.

With us the case is different. We stand consecrated to the single political idea of government by the consent of the governed. To introduce into the life of the nation the other thought of government by force is, at the very outset, to precipitate a conflict which, sooner or later, must inevitably result in disaster.

Neither have we been so successful in our treatment of dependent races in the past as to justify any exalted expectations for the future. We have called the Indian tribes the wards of the nation, and our best citizens have striven from the beginning of the Government to the present time to secure to them their just rights, and with what result? The eccentric Congressman from New Hampshire is credited with the statement that the Puritans marched among the Indians with a Bible in one hand and a rifle in the other. They converted those they could with the one and disposed of the rest with the other. Helen Hunt has told the story of our dealings with these tribes in a book which she entitles A Century of Dishonor. Are we entirely sure that a century of dishonor in respect to savages near at home will not be followed by a millennium of dishonor in respect to those beyond the seas?

To hear some talk you would think that all the influences going out from this Christian nation to the heathen have been Christian, purifying, elevating; but the fact is that even from Puritan New England there have gone more hogsheads of rum than missionaries, more gallons of whisky than Bibles. If anyone imagines that this will be changed when we come into control of the Philippines and attempt to rule them, that thereafter only missionaries and Bibles will pass thither from America, he sadly underrates the locomotive capacity of the devil.

Again, a necessity of colonial possessions is an increase in our Regular Army, and the first increase proposed is from 30,000 to 100,000 men. It is a strange commentary that at the close of the nineteenth century the head of the most arbitrary government in the civilized world, the Czar of the Russias, is inviting the nations of the world to a decrease in their arms, while this, the freest land, is proposing an increase in its. Yet such seems to be the imperative need, if we enter upon the system of colonial expansion. We have lived and prospered for one hundred and twenty-three years with a handful of regular troops. We have preserved peace at home and have been respected abroad. Government by consent of the governed has little need of the soldier. So the world has come to believe, and so it is. Are we ready to forfeit this high position? Do we not endanger the very foundation principles of this Government when we make the blare of the bugles and the tramp of the armed battalion the music which is heard on every side and the inspiration which attracts the ambition of our youth?

Another aspect of this question is worth noticing, and that is its relation to labor. We are facing in this country a difficult problem. The inventive spirit of our people is multiplying with marvelous rapidity labor-saving machines. By the use of them one or two skilled laborers will do the work heretofore done by many unskilled laborers. There is, therefore, a surplus of unemployed labor. The machine is supplanting the man. We are facing the fact of an increasing amount of unemployed and unskilled labor. What shall be done? China, with its enormous population, has sought to solve it by prohibiting the machine. Is that the best solution we can offer? It has not a few advocates in our midst. The boycott put on the Oxley Stave Company, which resulted in litigation, going up to the court of appeals, in the eighth circuit, was founded on the fact that the company introduced machines into its manufactory for doing work which had theretofore been done by hand. The complaint indorsed by the Federation of Labor against the United States Superintendent of Printing and Engraving is of the same nature.

Everywhere we hear a claim that the cleaning of streets must be done by hand labor instead of by machine. More than one labor body has protested against the employment of women. I am not here to indorse all these, but simply to note the fact that labor realizes that it has a surplus and is seeking to reduce it. Now, the great economic problem in this country is not how can a few men make more money and pile up larger fortunes? But how can the great body of the people make a fair and comfortable living? The right to work is again and again insisted upon as more important than the right to vote, and the cry of the right to work is supplemented by the cry that the state furnish work to all who can not obtain it elsewhere. But the furnishing of work by the state means more taxation, and that implies added burdens on the employed to furnish support and sustenance to the unemployed.

The problem is a serious one. We have 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 of unskilled colored laborers south of the Mason and Dixon line; and we find the governor of a great Northern State threatening to stand at its borders with Gatling guns and shoot down those laborers if they attempt to enter to compete with its white laborers, and this in face of the constitutional provision that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the separate States." Are we likely to aid in solving this problem by bringing into our national life 10,000,000 or 12,000,000 of unskilled Malay laborers?

We have shut the doors against the Chinese. Are they any worse than the Malay? Shall we introduce in this nation more cheap labor? For labor is cheap where the cost of living is cheap, and the Malay needs but a little rice within his body and a little cotton cloth outside, and a very little rice and a very little cloth is sufficient. I do not wonder at the action of the Federation of Labor in protesting against a new competition of cheap labor as well as an increase of the Army, with its consequent increase of burden and taxation on the employed laborer.

There is a frequent expression of the thought that this proposed expansion will fill the mind of the nation with new problems and new questions, and therefore turn its attention away from the problems and troubles which now embarrass us. I concede it, and if turning attention away from these interior problems would solve them it were well, but I am sure it will not bring solution. Giving liquor to a man may for the time being cause him to forget his troubles, but it does not end them, and when the period of intoxication is over the troubles reappear, and generally with added force. We can not escape these difficult problems of our internal life by looking out on the distant world. They are here, and must be met and solved by patient, faithful, earnest attention. We can not get away from them. We must overcome them. We may postpone, but we only add to the difficulties thereby.

But there is money in it. And after all this is really the most potent factor in the proposed reaching out after the islands of the Orient. The wealth of Ormus and of Ind is to-day as in the days of Milton the expectation and the dream of many. Possession of the Orient, with its accumulated wealth of centuries, dazzles the imagination and confuses the judgment. The haze of mystery hangs over that vast domain. Wealth untold is believed to be there, ready to be appropriated by any dominant power. All the nations and tribes come within Lord Salisbury's definition of dying nations, and must soon be divided between and appropriated by the living and growing nations.

China is held out as a dying nation, filled with inexhaustible wealth, and why should not we share in its appropriation? What a picture this is! The eagle of liberty standing like a buzzard to grow fat over an expected corpse. When a Washington doctor of divinity the other day, in conversation with the Chinese minister, in reference to the possession taken by Germany of part of her territory, said that it seemed to him that Russia and England were likely to follow the same example and appropriate some Chinese territory, the sarcastic reply was, "Yes; that is the way Christian nations do."

This matter of wealth has two sides to it. The poet says:

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

It is not true that a mere increase of wealth foreshadows ruin and decay. It is not the possession of riches, but the way in which they are accumulated that makes the menace. We have exported from this country in the last year $1,200,000,000 worth of our products. They were the fruit of our toil of hand and brain, and the increased wealth which flows into the land as a reward for such toil carries with it no menace, but the wealth which comes without an equivalent in toil of hand or brain is the wealth which threatens. Who is injured by money? Not the one that earns it day by day, dollar by dollar, and saves until he accumulates a fortune, but he who by the chance discovery of a mine, or an accidental speculation in stocks, finds himself changed from poverty to sudden wealth; and that which is true of the individual is true of the nation. Whatever it accumulates by honest toil is not a curse. Whatever it obtains without giving value may be fruitful of injury. Exchanging bright colored but cheap calicoes for furs and jewels may rapidly pile up wealth, but such wealth is more apt to curse than to bless.

This idea of the nation going into the midst of races and people where things of value have been heaped up during the centuries, and are possessed by those ignorant of their value, and appropriating those things, either by force or in exchange for cheap trinkets and gewgaws, is one filled with danger. The Cæsars saw the spears of their victorious legions flash in the sunlight of every known land, and in their triumphant return they brought with them the accumulated wealth of all the nations they had subdued. The splendor of imperial Rome outshone the world, but the wealth thus obtained without value given undermined the empire and the glory of Rome is simply a memory. Napoleon beheld the shining star of destiny; and then? Does human nature change through the centuries? We stand to-day facing the temptation which comes from the possibility of rapidly accumulated wealth. What right have we to anticipate that the same results will not follow if we pursue the same course of taking what we have not fully earned?

Again, this reaching out to the Orient is an implied repudiation of the Monroe doctrine, and exposes to additional perils and complications and possible wars with European nations. The scope of that doctrine I have already indicated. We have shouted ourselves hoarse in its praise and declared our willingness to fight in vindication of its pinciples if necessary.

It declares that we oppose any interference by European nations with States on this continent, any appropriation here of additonal territory by those nations; in other words, we practically said that the powers of the Eastern Hemisphere must keep off the Western; that in this continent the problem of government of and by and for the people was being worked out, and that any attempt by European nations to take territory and thus introduce or perpetuate European ideas of government here must be resisted.

And this declaration, it must be borne in mind, was not simply in reference to the States of this Union, but to all the States and nations on this continent. When we thus formally and positively assert that the Eastern nations must keep hands off from this continent, there is an implied promise that we will keep our hands off from the other. It would be absurd to suppose that either this country or other nations understood that declaration to mean you must not come onto this continent and take any possessions, but we may come onto your continent and do as we please. The independence of one was a guaranty of the independence of the other.

Now, entering the Orient to possess it is a repudiation of that doctrine, for the moment we enter there and appropriate territory, that moment it ceases to become us to insist that European nations shall keep off from this continent. We can not either rightfully or successfully pose as a supreme dictator of the world. If we ask other nations to respect the separation of this continent, we must also respect the separation of that. Indeed, the forcible taking possession by us of islands in the West Indies or portions of South America while not inconsistent with the Monroe doctrine, seems a good deal like a slur upon it.

When we insist that the problem of government by the people must have free course on this continent it seems hardly consistent to say that no European nation shall infringe upon that proposition, but we may. Not only will the fact of a departure from the principles of the Monroe doctrine provoke challenge on the part of European nations, but the possession of outlying territories will add to our complications with such nations. It is a matter of common knowledge that European nations are constantly in trouble between themselves by reason of differences and collisions arising between their respective colonies. England and France, England and Russia have been again and again on the point of war growing out of such troubles. We shall enter upon the same embarrassment and be exposed to all the complications and dangers attending.

Neither is the incorporation of these millions of ignorant Malays into our national life as fellow-citizens, even through the probationary stage of Territorial existence, freighted with less of danger. The problem we have sought to work out in this nation is that of government of and by and for the people. A great nation upon that principle seems possible only under a federal system, a system which relegates all matter of local interest to the several states, and exercises through the national government only those powers and functions which make for the general welfare. We have wonderfully prospered in administering such system in a compact, continental territory, each part of which has been possessed and controlled by a race capable of self-government.

Imagine for one moment the outcome if in this compact continental territory all local as well as national affairs were determined and administered in the one national Capitol at Washington. Ignorance of local needs would inevitably be followed by the invasion of a lobby representing those needs, and Washington, which even now is shadowed by the presence of enormous and conflicting national interests seeking to influence and control Congress, would be turned into one vast, monumental lobby camp.

The safety of government by the people has been in local self-government. The town meeting has perpetuated the Republic. Thus far the various States entering this Federal system have been dominated by a race capable of self-government. Introduce into that system to-morrow a multitude of States whose people are confessedly incapable of self-government and you will bury it beneath the burden of local incapacity. A chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and a federal system some of whose links are composed of States incapable of self-control will, unless all the laws of human action are reversed, break in pieces through the weakness of the incapable links.

We have had Territories and kept them in a state of tutelage, but that status was continued, not until the residents thereof became capable of self-government, but until the number of the population was sufficient to justify assuming the burdens of statehood. Territorial organizations, probationary as they are, for races incapable of self-government, not only repudiate the basic thought of the national life, but remain a constant and increasing menace to its successful accomplishment. Who can tell how many centuries must pass before the savage and semi-civilized races of these islands become fit to assume the responsibilities of self-government? Is this territorial period to be permanent? Who shall say how soon the necessities of politics will transform a Territory into a State? And when once brought into the Union we have links in the Federal system so weak that a very little strain will snap them.

In the Union as it stands we have elements of no slight danger. We have welcomed the emigrant from all parts of the world, and in the cities of the North we have an enormous population of the lowest orders of European life, unacquainted with and unfit for self-government, and a great problem is how to bring these unfit masses into a helpful addition to American life. In the South we have the rapidly increasing colored population, brought here as slaves, emancipated through the most awful drain of life and money, elevated in ignorance to citizenship, and every State south of Mason and Dixon's line to-day trembles before the unsolved question of preserving intelligent self-government and at the same time guaranteeing rights of citizenship to an ignorant mass. With these problems resting upon and burdening the nation, is it wise to throw upon it the awful problem of dealing with millions far more incapable of and unused to self-government? Can we expect to find safety in adding to our difficulties?

Can we relieve against one problem of dealing with ignorant and unfit masses here by adding millions more to the problem? This is no trifling question and is not answered by any gush about duty and destiny; in fact, all this talk about destiny is wearisome. We make our own destiny. We are not the victims, but the masters, of fate, and to attempt to unload upon the Almighty responsibility for that which we choose to do is not only an insult to Him, but to ordinary human intelligence. We are told we have become so great and powerful that the world needs us, but what the world most needs is not the touch of our power, but the blessings of our example. It needs the bright example of a free people not disturbed by any illusions of territorial acquisition, of pecuniary gain or military glory, but content with their possessions and striving, through all the abilities, activities, and industries of their wisest and most earnest to make the life of each individual citizen happier, better, and more content.

My friends, two visions rise before me: One of a nation growing in population, riches, and strength; reaching out the strong hand to bring within its dominion weaker and distant races and lands; holding them by force for the rapid wealth they may bring—with perhaps the occasional glory, success, and sacrifice of war; a wondrously luxurious life into which the fortunate few shall enter; an accumulation of magnificence which for a term will charm and dazzle, and then the shadow of the awful question whether human nature has changed, and the old law, that history repeats itself, has lost its force, whether the ascending splendor of imperial power is to be followed by the descending gloom of luxury, decay, and ruin.

The other of a nation, where the spirit of the Pilgrim and the Huguenot remains the living and controlling force, affirming that the Declaration of Independence, the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country, and the Monroe doctrine shall never pass into innocuous desuetude; devoting its energies to the development of the inexhaustible resources of its great continental territory; solving the problem of universal personal and political liberty, of a government by the consent of the governed, where no king, no class, and no race rules, but each individual has equal voice and power in the control of all, where wealth comes only as the compensation for honest toil of hand or brain, where public service is private duty; a nation whose supreme value to the world lies not in its power, but in its unfailing loyalty to the high ideals of its youth, its forever lifting its strong hand, not to govern, but only to protect the weak; and thus the bright shining which brightens more and more into the fadeless eternal day.

Brethren, Ebal and Gerizim are before us. Might and right stand on either side with their great appeals.

To every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side;
Careless seems the great Avenger; history's pages but record
One death grapple in the darkness 'twixt old systems and the Word;
Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne,
Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above His own.
We see dimly in the present what is small and what is great,
Slow of faith how weak an arm may turn the iron helm of fate,
But the soul is still oracular; and amid the market's din,
List the ominous stern whisper from the Delphic cave within,
"They enslave their children's children who make compromise with sin."

Paraphrasing in part the invocation which attends the opening of the Supreme Court, God save the United States of America and keep them from the road so often traveled by nations, of increasing territory, accumulating dominion, rapidly and easily acquired wealth, luxurious splendor, a growing separation between the poor and the rich, presaging decay and death; and may we always hear the solemn prayer of Abraham Lincoln, borne upward to Heaven from the consecrated field of Gettysburg upon the mighty volume of patriotic incense which ever rises from that sacred spot, that government of and by and for the people may never perish from the earth.

God of our fathers, known of old,
Lord of our far-flung battle line,
Beneath whose awful hand we hold
Dominion over palm and pine—
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

Far-called our navies melt away,
On dune and headland sinks the fire;
Lo! all our pomp of yesterday
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!
Judge of the Nations, spare us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

If, drunk with sight of power, we loose
Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe—
Such boastings as the Gentiles use,
Or lesser breeds without the Law—
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I believe there are only seven minutes remaining to this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The other side have nearly forty minutes; and I submit that in all fairness, as two or three gentlemen are to speak on that side, they ought to use a portion of their remaining time.

Mr. PAYNE. I prefer that the gentleman should proceed. We have proceeded on the understanding that we were to close the debate in the last forty minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We have made no agreement.

Mr. PAYNE. I give the gentleman notice now.

Mr. RICHARDSON. With the forty minutes remaining to the other side they ought to use a portion of their time, because we have only nine minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion that if two or three gentlemen are to occupy the forty minutes, one of them ought to come in at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is very unusual, Mr. Speaker, to adopt the course which has been adopted by the gentleman from New York. It is very unusual for gentlemen who have the right to close to make three speeches in conclusion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just stated to the gentleman from New York that if there be different ones to consume the remaining thirty-nine or forty minutes there should be a division of the time. If one gentleman is to consume all the time, it would be otherwise.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, it was not my purpose when I came to the House this morning to indulge in any remarks upon this bill. I recognized the fact that every member of the House, on both sides of the Chamber, had his mind made up as to which side of the question he would vote, and that nothing that can be said here to-day would influence any person either for or against this bill. Some remarks have, however, been made by gentlemen who oppose the bill that I feel I can not let pass without some observations.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], who is a member of the Ways and Means Committee, in the remarks which he made here to-day, assumed that by the coalition which he has made with the Democratic members of the House he has driven the Republican members from the position which they assumed when they reported this bill. I deny, Mr. Speaker, that the Republican members, in supporting the measure now before us, have changed an iota on any principle of constitutional law or any matter of revenue from what was reported by us.

This bill was presented to this gentleman before it was reported to the House. He had no criticism to make of it as a fiscal measure. In those early days he had no objection to the imposition of a 15 or a 25 per cent duty upon the products that are imported from Porto Rico into the United States. His objection then was a constitutional objection and that alone. If he has seen new light, he has obtained it from his association with the Democratic party, who are unalterably opposed to every measure that is advocated by the Republican party in this House or in the Senate.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Especially expansion and tariff.

Mr. HOPKINS. Now, the gentleman has assumed that in the preparation of this bill, in providing revenue for the people of the island of Porto Rico, we are doing something a little harsher in its terms than we do for the people of New Mexico or Oklahoma or any of the other Territories. Why, Mr. Speaker, any person familiar with the legislation of our country, any man familiar with the history of our country, ought to know that the legislation that is proposed in this bill for the island of Porto Rico is far better for them than the laws that are imposed by the General Government upon the people of the Territory of New Mexico or Oklahoma.

The people of those Territories pay the internal-revenue taxes and war taxes that are imposed the same as taxes imposed upon the States. Taxes that are gathered from those Territories are paid into the Treasury of the United States and paid out by the General Government without any special benefit to the people of those Territories. The tax that we propose is a tax not taken from the people, only in an indirect method, as has been explained here again and again, and instead of going into the Treasury of the United States, we place it in the hands of the President to be expended for the people of the island.

Gentlemen know well that no money has been appropriated by the General Government for the purpose of building roads in Oklahoma, New Mexico, or the Indian Territory; that no money has been taken from the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of constructing public-school houses and in establishing public schools in any of those Territories; and yet, under this bill, we propose, as was stated by the gentleman who opened this debate when we first considered the bill, to take $300,000 of this money for the purpose of establishing public-school houses and maintaining public schools in the island of Porto Rico.

Three hundred thousand dollars more are to be used for the purpose of constructing and repairing roads for the benefit of the people of Porto Rico. Wherein, then, gentlemen, are we doing anything in this legislation that is harsh or oppressive against the people of Porto Rico that is not imposed on the people of the United States by some kind of legislation? Again, some gentlemen who have engaged in debate here to-day have assumed that we are violating some great moral principle in the enactment of this bill into law, and are going counter to the proclamation made by General Miles touching the people of the island when he went down there with his victorious army.

I want to know, Mr. Speaker, where is the paragraph, the sentence, or even the word in any proclamation or in any statement made by General Miles to the people of Porto Rico that is violated by the bill we have here to-day? I claim, sir, that this bill is in strict accord with the humanitarian principles that were expressed by General Miles at the head of his victorious army when he received the surrender of the people of that island. I claim, sir, not only that, but we have gone further, even, than was outlined by him in the proclamation that he made.

Did he say to the people of Porto Rico that they should have free trade? Not at all. Did he indicate to them the character of civil government that they should have? Not at all. He simply stated to them, in substance, that by their becoming a part of the United States they would receive a higher civilization and would receive a larger liberty than had been accorded to them under Spanish rule.

Now, sir, take the statements of this general and give full force to all he said, and then compare the laws that were in force in Porto Rico at the time the people of the island surrendered and the law we propose to enact in this bill, and you will see that all the hope he held out to the people will be more than realized. When Spain controlled that island there were consumption laws, license laws, and a system of legislation that took from these people, month after month, and year by year, millions of money in taxation. Taxes that were extorted from these people by the tax-gatherers under Spanish rule have been taken from them by order of the President of the United States. None of these harsh and inhuman tax laws are reenacted by this bill. None of that monarchical system of legislation has been resorted to in the proposed law.

As has been said again and again, the tariff feature of the bill is only temporary. The question has been asked, "Why impose it at all?" The Governor-General of the island informed the Ways and Means Committee of the House that to administer the civil affairs of the island in a manner that would harmonize with American ideas would require $2,000,000 annually. The island had been visited by a hurricane most destructive in character, the cane and coffee crops had been entirely ruined, a large part of the personal property of the island had been destroyed, and several thousand people killed.

The internal-revenue laws of the United States, if extended to the island of Porto Rico, would impose taxes upon the people not only oppressive but absolutely beyond their ability to pay them. One-third of the population, we found, were paupers, and a large majority of the balance of the population day laborers, working for from 20 to 30 cents per day, American money. It is apparent to all thinking men that to frame a system of internal-revenue laws for the island similar to those enforced in the States and in the Territories would not only be an absurdity but absolutely indefensible.

Three methods, then, were suggested to raise the needed revenue for the island: First, a loan of several million dollars and the bonding of the island for its payment; second, a direct appropriation from the Treasury of the United States; and, third, the imposition of tariff duties as provided for in the revenue features of this bill. The policy of bonding the island to raise money to meet this emergency did not meet with approval. It was thought to be poor policy to handicap the inhabitants by fastening upon them at the very inception of their new national life a large bonded indebtedness.

No member of the committee felt like defending a direct appropriation from the Treasury of the United States. That would be taxing the people of the United States for the benefit of the Porto Ricans, with no resultant benefits to our Government or our people. This left as the only feasible method for raising the revenue the customs duties provided for in this bill. When it is remembered that the major part of the revenue received under this bill will be from raw sugar and tobacco in the hands of speculators and the tobacco and sugar trusts, it will be seen that it imposes no heavy burdens upon the people.

I affirm here to-day that no revenue system can be devised that will raise $2,000,000 per annum for the benefit of the Porto Ricans from the property and people of that island that can be so easily paid and that will rest so lightly upon the Porto Ricans as the system recommended in this bill. The tariff features of the bill for raising revenue have been made temporary because it is expected that when a stable civil government is established in the island sufficient money can be raised by local laws to meet all of the requirements for administering the civil government and improving the educational, political, and industrial condition of the people.

At present the Porto Ricans have no system of laws for the government of the people locally or Territorially, such as is found in the States or the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, or Oklahoma. Everything there is in a chaotic condition. The rules and regulations that control the people at present are Executive orders of the President. It will take time after the civil-government feature of this bill becomes a law to put it in operation in Porto Rico. Months will pass before a local legislature can be convened under the authority contained in this bill or any laws which Congress might give to the Porto Ricans.

I am within the limits of moderation when I say that a full year will expire before the legislative body proposed in this bill can enact local laws for the raising of revenue and create the offices and appoint the officers to execute such laws. When this is all accomplished, local assessors will be required to go out over the island and make an inventory of all property found there and the resources of the people.

In Illinois and in most of the States and Territories a full year is given to the people after assessments are made by the duly authorized officer for such purposes before the tax collector is authorized to collect the assessments levied for local purposes against the citizens. This, mark you, is in a country where all of the machinery for collecting local and general taxes is in perfect order and where the people have been accustomed from time immemorial to this method of taxation.

In Porto Rico much more time will be required, much more difficulty will be experienced, in enforcing the law than in the States. If, then, a year is allowed the Porto Ricans after the assessor makes an inventory of their property and resources before the tax collector is sent out to collect the revenues, as is done in the States, you can see that the two years provided for tariff revenues in this bill will expire.

The truth is that in our great desire to be not only fair but generous to the Porto Ricans we have limited the law to too short a period. It must be apparent to all that during this emergency period justice to the Porto Ricans themselves requires the legislation here proposed to raise money sufficient to carry on a civil government in the island and prepare the people for self-government. They need public schools, highways of communication, training in local self-government, and many other privileges that have heretofore been denied them, and which can now only be given them by raising the $2,000,000 per annum suggested by Governor-General Davis in his recommendation to Congress.

The more this measure is studied the clearer its merits will appear. No substitute has been suggested by the Democrats that can meet the emergency provided for in this bill. They play with success the part of carping critics. Their ability begins and ends there. Time will demonstrate the wisdom of our action to-day. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, in the very few minutes allowed to this side I again take the floor. I would not do so if it were not for the fact of having made my former statement. It is due to the War Department, due to the Secretary of War, that I should make this statement. I stated in the few remarks I made earlier in the day that the law officer of the War Department, Judge Magoon, charged with the duty of advising the Secretary of War as to his power and right in dealing with insular affairs, as such officer had delivered an opinion, and that that opinion was directly in contravention of the opinion which the same officer recently submitted to the Secretary of War.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if that were true, it was a grave charge to make against the Secretary of War and his law officer and adviser; if it were not true, it ought not to have been made upon this floor. I stated, when I had the floor, that I made this charge based upon an article in the New York Herald. It was a grave charge to make against the Secretary of War, because that officer had sent to Congress the opinion of Judge Magoon, the pamphlet of 72 pages to which I referred. He gave us no intimation that Mr. Magoon had delivered any other and contrary opinion. Let me ask, in sending the opinion of Judge Magoon why did he not give us the benefit of both of his opinions?

I quoted from the article in the Herald what purported to be excerpts from that opinion of the lawful adviser of the Secretary of War. I did not know that these quotations were correct; I assumed that they were. On last Saturday this House passed a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to furnish the House of Representatives with the opinion of this legal adviser of his, if he had such opinion. I stated when I was on the floor earlier to-day that no response had been made to that resolution.

But, Mr. Speaker, since I took my seat I wish to say that the Secretary of War has complied with the request of the House of Representatives, and he has transmitted to us the opinion which we sought to obtain by the passage of the resolution on last Saturday.

I will ask the Clerk to read the letter from the Secretary of War.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, April 11, 1900.

SIR: In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives, dated March 30, 1900, directing the Secretary of War "to furnish the House of Representatives with any opinion or opinions given the Department by Charles E. Magoon, law officer of the division of insular affairs, as to whether the Constitution was extended ex proprio vigore to the island of Porto Rico when the peace convention between the United States and Spain was ratified; and in furnishing such opinion or opinions, if any were given, will also furnish such arguments or reasons as were assigned by said Magoon in support thereof," I have the honor to report that an exact compliance with the request contained in this resolution would require an answer that the law officer of the insular division has not rendered an opinion on the question referred to.

In May, 1899, criticism having been made on the established practice of the War Department in maintaining in Porto Rico the tariff schedules adopted by the military government which differed from the provisions of the tariff laws of the United States, I requested Mr. Magoon to furnish me a statement of the arguments against the continuance of the course being pursued.

This request was complied with by the preparation of the memorandum, copy of which is inclosed. The memorandum was not made in any case pending in the Department. It was entirely unofficial and intended for my personal use. Upon consideration the argument against continuance was not considered to be well founded, and no change was made in said tariff regulations.

In January, 1900, Mr. Magoon was requested to report generally the results of his investigation into the questions of law embraced in said resolution, which he did on February 12, 1900, a copy of which has already become a Congressional document and printed by order of the Senate.

Very respectfully,

G. D. MEIKLEJOHN,
Assistant Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is that opinion? It is exactly as I stated it was when I had the floor this morning and as charged in the New York Herald. I have that opinion in my hand, and I propose to read, Mr. Speaker, about one page of it for the edification and delight of gentlemen on the other side of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I asked why gentlemen on that side of the House have changed their opinion? The country wishes an answer to this question. Why have you changed your opinion? Why did Mr. Magoon, the legal adviser of the Secretary of War on insular affairs, change his opinion? Mr. Speaker, this House is familiar with the late opinion of Mr. Magoon, Charles E. Magoon, of Nebraska. It covers 72 pages of printed matter, bears date February 12, 1900, and is a Senate document open to every one.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. That is "after taking."

Mr. RICHARDSON. This is "after taking." It contains 72 pages, in which he says that Congress must legislate before the Constitution goes to Porto Rico. The Constitution can not get across the waters of the Atlantic and into that little island until the Congress of the United States takes it there. That is what he says, and he brings 72 pages of argument here to confirm and prove that contention. This was February 12, 1900.

What did he say, Mr. Speaker, before any emergency arose? This opinion was delivered about the time the able chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. PAYNE, changed his opinion in this House; after other gentlemen changed their opinions upon this question. I hold in my hand the legal opinion of this same gentleman, dated the 30th day of May, 1899. And what does it say?

This lawyer, in his opinion of May 30, 1899, shows the greatest familiarity with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on the question at issue. He takes the case of Cross vs. Harrison, 16 Howard's Reports; the case of Fleming vs. Page, 9 Howard's Reports, and other decisions of that court and carefully considers them. These cases were referred to frequently by gentlemen in this House in debating this bill. He quotes rulings of the Treasury Department and many strong authorities, and sums up the whole case in language I now quote. He squarely and unequivocally announces that the Constitution goes to Porto Rico ex proprio vigore, and that Congress must look to the Constitution to legislate for Porto Rico. After a thorough investigation he solemnly gave his opinion as follows:

The proposition advanced is, that the island of Porto Rico is now an integral part of the United States. Being such, the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of that land. The provisions of section 8, Article III, to wit, "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," should be applied to that island; that the exchange of mutual ratifications of the treaty made Porto Rico a part of the United States, and as soon as it became so the island was subject to the acts which were in force to regulate foreign commerce with the United States. (Cross et al. vs. Harrison, 16 Howard, 198.)

The cession of Porto Rico by Spain to the United States was accomplished in the same manner as a transfer of real estate between individuals. Spain by the treaty manifested its intention to convey as a grantor. Congress by ratifying the treaty manifested the intention of the United States to accept as a grantee. The exchange of ratifications was the delivery of the instrument of conveyance and thereby the transfer became complete. Thereupon the territory conveyed became a part of the United States, and as such, subject to the Constitution. No further action by Congress was necessary or possible. The Constitution does not depend upon Congress for authority in any part of the United States. The reverse of the proposition is the fact. From this time on Congress must look to the Constitution for authority to legislate for Porto Rico.

The existing general enactments of Congress are in force throughout the territorial limits of the United States. Porto Rico being brought within said territorial limits is subject to said laws. The absence of the required instruments for the successful operation of these laws may temporarily hold some of them in abeyance, but they are nevertheless laws of the land.

I will not quote more of this opinion here, as I have not time to do so, but will publish it in full as a part of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I have no words of condemnation for Mr. Magoon, the subordinate law officer who changed his opinion; but what will the country think of the Secretary of War who demanded that this change should be made? [Long and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

The opinion referred to is as follows:

The proposition advanced is, that the island of Porto Rico is now an integral part of the United States. Being such, the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of that land. The provisions of section 8, Article III, to wit, "All duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States," should be applied to that island; that the exchange of mutual ratifications of the treaty made Porto Rico a part of the United States, and as soon as it became so the island was subject to the acts which were in force to regulate foreign commerce with the United States. (Cross et al. vs. Harrison, 16 How., 198.)

The cession of Porto Rico by Spain to the United States was accomplished in the same manner as a transfer of real estate between individuals. Spain by the treaty manifested its intention to convey as a grantor. Congress by ratifying the treaty manifested the intention of the United States to accept as a grantee. The exchange of ratifications was the delivery of the instrument of conveyance and thereby the transfer became complete. Thereupon the territory conveyed became a part of the United States and as such subject to the Constitution. No further action by Congress was necessary or possible. The Constitution does not depend upon Congress for authority in any part of the United States. The reverse of the proposition is the fact. From this time on Congress must look to the Constitution for authority to legislate for Porto Rico.

The existing general enactments of Congress are in force throughout the territorial limits of the United States. Porto Rico being brought within said territorial limits is subject to said laws. The absence of the required instruments for the successful operation of these laws may temporarily hold some of them in abeyance, but they are nevertheless laws of the land.

That the Fifty-fifth Congress entertained the view that the existing tariff and navigation laws would be in force in after-acquired territory of the United States without further action by Congress is manifest from the following provision in the joint resolution to provide for annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States:

"Until legislation shall be enacted extending the United States customs laws and regulations to the Hawaiian Islands, the existing customs relations of the Hawaiian Islands with the United States and other countries shall remain unchanged." (Public resolution No. 55, Statutes at Large, volume 30, page 750.)

Neither the treaty with Spain nor the act by which Congress ratified said treaty contains provisions calculated or intended to exempt the commerce of the ceded territory from the operation of the laws of the United States.

In Cross et al. vs. Harrison (16 How., 164), the United States Supreme Court say:

"By the ratification of the treaty California became a part of the United States. And as there is nothing differently stipulated in the treaty with respect to commerce it became instantly bound and privileged by the laws which Congress had passed to raise a revenue from duties on imports and tonnage." (Id., page 197.)

Strike out the word "California" in the above quotation and insert "Porto Rico" and we have the conclusion of the whole matter in a nutshell.

In determining these questions as applied to Porto Rico, we are fortunate in having the precedents of administrative action and interpretation and also judicial determination of the questions as presented by a similar condition of affairs in what was then known as Upper California.

In the war with Mexico the port of San Francisco was conquered by the military forces of the United States in the year 1846, and soon thereafter the United States held military possession of all of Upper California. Early in 1847 the President of the United States, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, authorized the military and naval commanders of the United States forces in California to exercise the billigerent rights of a conqueror, and to form a civil and military government for the conquered territory, with power to impose duties on imports and tonnage for the support of the Government and of the army which had the conquest in possession. This was done, and tonnage and import duties were levied under a war tariff established by the military government of civil affairs.

The treaty of peace with Mexico was signed February 2, 1848, and ratified by Congress May 30, 1848. Notice of such ratification reached California August 6, 1848. On August 7, 1848, a proclamation was issued by Col. R. B. Mason, the governor, announcing the ratification of the treaty of peace, by which Upper California was ceded to the United States, and on August 9, 1848, instruction was given to the collector of customs at San Francisco that "the tariff of duties for the collection of military contributions will immediately cease; the revenue laws and tariff of the United States will be substituted in its place."

With reference to this instruction to the collector by the military governor and its recognition as lawful by President Polk and his Cabinet, the United States Supreme Court say:

"We think it was a rightful and correct recognition under all the circumstances; and when we say rightful, we mean that it was constitutional, although Congress had not passed an act to extend the collection of tonnage and import duties to the ports of California." (Cross vs. Harrison, 16 How., 189, 190.)

This action was ratified by the War Department by letter of date October 9, 1848, written by Mr. W. L. Marcy, Secretary of War, to Colonel Mason, as the commander of United States forces in California. From said letter the following is quoted:

"But the government de facto can, of course, exercise no powers inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of all the States and Territories of our Union. For this reason no import duties can be levied in California on articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any State or Territory of the United States, and no such duties can be imposed in any part of the Union on the productions of California; nor can duties be charged on such foreign productions as have already paid duties in any part of the United States."

In October, 1848, Mr. James Buchanan, the Secretary of State, by direction of President Polk, addressed the following letter to Mr. William H. Vorhies, then about to proceed to California upon a Government mission:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington City, October 7, 1848.

SIR: Previous to your departure for California, the President has instructed me to make known, through your agency, to the citizens of the United States inhabiting that Territory, his views respecting their present condition and future prospects.

* * * * * * * *

The President congratulates the citizens of California on the annexation of their fine province to the United States. On the 30th of May, 1848, the day on which the ratifications of our late treaty with Mexico were exchanged, California finally became an integral part of this great and glorious Republic. * * * The President deeply regrets that Congress did not, at their late session, establish a Territorial government for California. It would now be vain to enter into the reasons for this omission. Whatever these may have been, he is firmly convinced that Congress feel a deep interest in the welfare of California and its people and will, at an early period of the next session, provide for them a Territorial government suited to their wants.

* * * * * * * *

In the meantime the condition of the people of California is anomalous and will require on their part the exercise of great prudence and discretion. By the conclusion of the treaty of peace, the military government which was established over them, under the laws of war as recognized by the practice of all civilized nations, has ceased to derive its authority from this source of power. But is there, for this reason, no government in California? Are life, liberty, and property under the protection of no existing authorities? This would be a singular phenomenon in the face of the world, and especially among American citizens, distinguished as they are above all other people for their law-abiding character. Fortunately they are not reduced to this sad condition.

The termination of the war left an existing government—a government de facto—in full operation; and this will continue, with the presumed consent of the people, until Congress shall provide for them a Territorial government. The great law of necessity justifies this conclusion. The consent of the people is irresistibly inferred from the fact that no civilized community could possibly desire to abrogate an existing government when the alternative presented would be to place themselves in a state of anarchy beyond the protection of all laws, and reduce them to the unhappy necessity of submitting to the dominion of the strongest.

This government de facto will, of course, exercise no power inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land. For this reason no import duties can be levied in California on articles of growth, produce, or the manufacture of the United States, as no such duties can be imposed in any other part of our Union on the productions of California. Nor can new duties be charged in California upon such foreign productions as have already paid duties in any of our ports of entry, for the obvious reason that California is within the territory of the United States. I shall not enlarge upon this subject, however, as the Secretary of the Treasury will perform that duty. (Ex. Doc. No. 1, second session Thirtieth Congress, pages 47-48, War Department Cong. Doc. No. 537.)

On the same date Mr. R. J. Walker, Secretary of the Treasury, issued the following circular to collectors and other officers of the customs:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, October 7, 1848.

On the 30th of May last, upon the exchange of ratifications of our treaty with Mexico, California became a part of the American Union in consequence of which various questions have been presented by merchants and collectors for the decision of this Department.

By the Constitution of the United States is declared that "All treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." By the treaty with Mexico California is annexed to this Republic, and the Constitution of the United States is extended over that Territory and is in full force through its limits. Congress also, by several enactments subsequent to the ratification of the treaty, have distinctly recognized California as a part of the Union, and have extended over it in several important particulars the laws of the United States.

Under these circumstances the following instructions are issued by this Department:

First. All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of California, shipped therefrom at any time since the 30th of May last, are entitled to admission free of duty into all the ports of the United States.

Second. All articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States are entitled to admission free of duty into California, as are also all foreign goods which are exempt from duty by the laws of Congress, or on which goods the duties prescribed by those laws have been paid to any collector of the United States previous to their introduction into California.

Third. Although the Constitution of the United States extends to California, and Congress have recognized it by law as a part of the Union and legislated for it as such, yet it is not brought by law within the limits of any collection district, nor has Congress authorized the appointment of any officers to collect the revenue accruing on the import of foreign dutiable goods into that Territory. Under these circumstances, although this Department may be unable to collect the duties accruing on importations from foreign countries into California, yet, if foreign dutiable goods should be introduced there and shipped thence to any port or place of the United States, they will be subject to duty, as also to all the penalties prescribed by law when such importation is attempted without the payment of duties.

R. J. WALKER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The expression "although this Department may be unable to collect the duties accruing on importations from foreign countries into California" is understood to refer to the small military force at the command of Colonel Mason, which, at no time large, had become sadly depleted by lawful discharges and desertions occasioned by the "gold fever" then raging in California. The doubt was produced by the report of Colonel Mason, of date August 19, 1848, wherein he says:

"Two companies of Regulars, every day diminishing by desertions that can not be prevented, will soon be the only military forces in California, and they will be compelled of necessity to remain in San Francisco and Monterey, to guard the large depots of powder and munitions of war which can not be removed."

He calls attention to the disorganized conditions occasioned by the great influx of gold seekers, and further says:

"Should the people refuse to obey the existing authorities, or the merchants refuse to pay any duties, my force is inadequate to compel obedience." (Executive Document No. 1, second session, Thirtieth Congress page 157, War Department, No. 537.)

A number of persons who were desirous of landing foreign productions in California interpreted the circular issued by United States Treasurer Walker to mean that foreign productions could be imported in California free of duty, and prepared to land such goods in defiance of the law. Thereupon Colonel Mason requested the assistance of the naval forces of the United States then in that vicinity in enforcing the law. (See Document No. 18, page 672, first session Thirty-first Congress, War Department, No. 557.)

The importers also asked the commander in chief of said naval forces to what extent he would enforce the orders of Colonel Mason in regard to said matter and directed his attention to the Walker circular and other matters which they claimed established want of jurisdiction by Colonel Mason. The officer appealed to Commodore Jones, then in command of the United States naval forces in the Pacific Ocean, announced that he would support Colonel Mason, governor, to the full extent of the forces at his command. (Bill of exception in Cross et al. vs. Harrison, United States Supreme Court, December term, 1853.)

On April 1, 1849, the following circular was issued (see Senate Document No. 18, first session Thirty-first Congress, pages 695, 696):

HEADQUARTERS PACIFIC DIVISION,
San Francisco, Cal., April 1, 1849.

The treaty concluded with Mexico on the 30th of May last brought Upper California within the United States, and, of course, within the operation of all its laws. But the means of enforcing some of these laws have not been provided by Congress. Thus, as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his circular of the 30th of October last, observes, "Although Congress have recognized California as a part of the Union, and legislated for it as such, yet it is not brought by law within the limits of any collection district, nor has Congress authorized the appointment of any officers to collect the revenue." The laws of the United States are in force here, and consequently the revenue and navigation laws are, though at this moment some part of the machinery necessary to their complete action is wanting.

Now, the law declares that certain goods shall only enter upon having paid the duties prescribed by the tariff; and when the Secretary says that the Department is unable to collect duties on such, the proper inference is not, as many seem to think, that the goods can enter without paying duties, but that, being unable to pay the duties here as required by law, they can not be admitted at all.

As many cargoes had been shipped under the wrong impression that they could enter, and there was no American port of entry on the Pacific to which they could resort to comply with the law, a case of extreme hardship was presented, which appeared to authorize such a modification as would allow the cargoes to be entered on depositing the duties, to await the action of Congress on this subject. And so, from the want of American vessels on the coast, and from the unwillingness of the few in this ocean to frequent these ports, where the men desert to the gold mines, an absolute necessity of some means of transportation existed, which could only be supplied by using foreign vessels that came from the neighboring coasts.

But both of these modifications of law can be but temporary. There can be no hardship in enforcing the law on those who are fully aware of its provisions and their effect, and time will doubtless do away with the scarcity of American vessels of small class here. There will then be no reasons for indulgence, and the suspension of the strict enforcement of the law will cease. Even before that time the Government at Washington, thinking itself empowered to allow of any such suspension, may revoke the indulgence granted and require a strict adherence to the law, whatever may be the inconvenience to individuals.

I think it would be proper, then, to notify all persons designing to come here from your port, or its neighborhood, that they can have no right to count upon any other than the strictest construction of the law, as in all other ports of the United States, both as regards cargoes and vessels, and particularly that dutiable goods can not be entered here at all, unless Congress shall have made provision for appointing the necessary officers.

It would be well also to inform all adventurers coming here to search for gold that trespassing on the public lands is punishable by fine and imprisonment; that although the position of affairs here, incident to the change of government, has hitherto prevented action under these laws, yet they will be enforced as soon as the means are organized.

I should like to be informed of the date of your receipt of this communication, to be enabled to judge of the degree of indulgence proper to award to those claiming it.

PERSIFOR F. SMITH,
Brevet Major-General, Commanding Division.

To United States consuls, Valparaiso, Callao, Panama, Canton, Singapore, Manila, Sydney, Tahiti, Sandwich Islands, and all other ports of the Pacific Ocean.

The interpretation of the Walker circular made by General Smith in the foregoing circular is accepted as correct by the United States Supreme Court. (Cross vs. Harrison, 16 How., 194.) Such it certainly is as a legal proposition. But a review of the entire correspondence, with a knowledge of the turbulent conditions then existing in California, justifies the belief that the author of the Walker circular had in mind a question of fact, rather than one of law.

President Polk, in his message to Congress December 5, 1848, said:

* * * * * * *

"Upon the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace with Mexico on the 30th of May last, the temporary governments which had been established over New Mexico and California by our military and naval commanders, by virtue of the rights of war, ceased to derive any obligatory force from that source of authority, and, having been ceded to the United States, all government and control over them under the authority of Mexico had ceased to exist.

"Impressed with the necessity of establishing Territorial governments over them, I recommended the subject to the favorable consideration of Congress in my message communicating the ratified treaty of peace, on the 6th of July last, and invoked their action at that session. Congress adjourned without making any provision for their government. The inhabitants, by the transfer of their country, had become entitled to the benefits of our laws and Constitution, and yet were left without any regularly organized government. Since that time the very limited power possessed by the Executive has been exercised to preserve and protect them from the inevitable consequences of a state of anarchy. The only government which remained was that established by the military authority during the war.

"Regarding this to be a de facto government, and that by the presumed consent of the inhabitants it might be continued temporarily, they were advised to conform and submit to it for the short intervening period before Congress would again assemble and could legislate on the subject. The views entertained by the Executive on this point are contained in a communication of the Secretary of State, dated the 7th of October last, which was forwarded for publication to California and New Mexico, a copy of which is herewith transmitted."

* * * * * * * *

Congress finally created the territory embraced in Upper California a customs district and made San Francisco a port of entry, by act approved March 3, 1849. (9 Stats. L., 400.)

On November 13, 1849, Collector Collier, who had been duly appointed under the act of March 3, 1849, entered upon the discharge of his duties at San Francisco.

The status of the territory ceded by Mexico from the time of its invasion in 1846 to November 13, 1849, its relation to the United States at various intervals during this period, the character of the civil government maintained therein by the military authorities after the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace and cession with Mexico, and the right of civil government of the ceded territory to impose tonnage and import duties in accordance with and by virtue of the general tariff laws of the United States, without Congressional action extending said laws over said territory, were judicially determined by the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Cross et al. vs. Harrison (16 How., 164).

That case arose as follows: On September 3, 1848, Colonel Mason, as governor, appointed Edward H. Harrison collector of customs at San Francisco. Harrison, as such collector, required Cross, Hobson & Co. to pay tonnage on vessels and duties on merchandise, not of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the United States, imported by said firm from foreign places into California between February 3, 1848, and November 12, 1849. Cross, Hobson & Co. brought suit to recover the moneys so paid by the firm to Harrison. The cause was tried to a jury. There was no controversy as to the facts. The rights of the parties to the actions depended upon the law. The plaintiffs requested the court to instruct the jury as follows.

"1. That during the period from the 3d day of February, 1848, the date of the treaty of peace and limits with the Republic of Mexico, and the 3d of March, 1849, the date of the act of Congress which erected the State of California into a collection district of the United States, no duties accrue to the United States on merchandise not the production of the United States, nor of vessels not of the United States which arrived within the limits of California, ceded by said treaty to the United States, and that the exaction by the defendant of such alleged duties on such goods imported into California by the plaintiffs within said period was not authorized by any law of the United States and was therefore illegal.

"2. That during the period from the 3d of March, 1849, when the act of Congress erected the State of California into a collection district, and the 13th of November, 1849, when Collector Collier entered upon his duties as collector of customs at the port of San Francisco, in said district, the exaction of alleged duties to the United States by the defendant was not authorized by any law of the United States, and was therefore illegal, unless the jury shall find that the defendant was legally appointed and qualified to act as collector of the customs at San Francisco."

These instructions the court refused to give, and instead instructed the jury as follows:

"1. That between the 3d of February, 1848, and the 3d of March, 1849, duties did accrue to the United States on foreign merchandise not the production of the United States, and on foreign vessels not of the United States, which were imported into and arrived within the limits of California, as ceded to the United States by the treaty of peace and limits with the Republic of Mexico, signed at Guadaloupe Hidalgo.

"2. That after the act of 3d March, 1849, erecting the State of California into a collection district of the United States took effect, duties accrued to the United States, both on foreign merchandise not the production of the United States and on foreign vessels not of the United States, imported and brought within the limits of such collection district.

"3. That if, from the evidence in the cause, the jury shall find the plaintiffs were allowed by the defendant to enter their said foreign goods and vessels at another port of the United States within a collection district, and thereafter to land the same at San Francisco without further exaction of duties, and that the plaintiffs neglected so to do, and elected to enter and land the same at San Francisco, and pay duties thereon, and that the duties were paid by the defendant to the use of the United States, that then the said payment of duties was voluntary and not coercive, and the jury must find for the defendant."

To these instructions the plaintiffs excepted, and the verdict being for the defendant, the plaintiffs brought the cause to the United States Supreme Court on said exception. In determining the cause the court say:

* * * * * * * *

"The cause has been argued here with much research. Every argument has been brought to bear upon it by counsel on both sides which can enter into its consideration.

It seems, from the institution of the suit until now, to have been conducted with the wish upon the part of the United States to give to the plaintiffs every opportunity to establish their claim judicially, if that could be done, and with a desire upon its part to obtain from this court a decision as to what are the rights of the United States in respect to tonnage and impost duties in such a conjuncture as that was when California was ceded by treaty to the United States, before Congress had authorized such duties to be collected there by a special act. We have received much assistance from the argument, and make the acknowledgment the more readily because it has enabled us to come to conclusions which we believe will be satisfactory, though adverse from the claim of the plaintiffs.

"The purpose of the suit is to recover from the defendant certain tonnage duties and imposts, which were paid to him by the plaintiffs upon ships which had arrived in San Francisco, and upon foreign merchandise landed there from them between the 3d February, 1848, and the 13th November, 1849. Harrison has been appointed collector for the port of San Francisco by Colonel Mason, military governor of California. He told the plaintiffs, officially, that he would not permit them to land their goods without the payment of duties, stating that if they attempted to do so without having made an entry of them that they would be seized and forfeited. He placed an inspector of the customs on board of the vessels of the plaintiffs to prevent any merchandise from being landed from them without permits and entries, and when they complained that the duties which they were required to pay were illegal exactions, which they protested against, the collector refused to receive the duties under protest, and told the plaintiffs that they might enter their their ships at some other port in the United States and then discharge their goods at San Francisco.

"That he considered San Francisco a port in the United States at which foreign goods could not be landed without the payment of duties. It is as well to remark here, though the same fact appears in our statement of the case already given, that the duties for which the plaintiffs sue were paid by them between the 3d of February, 1848, and the 12th of November, 1849. They were paid, however, until some time in the fall of 1848, at the rate of the war tariff, which had been established early in the year before by direction of the President of the United States.

"The authority for that purpose given to the commander in chief of our naval force on that station was to establish port regulations, to prescribe the conditions upon which American and foreign vessels were to be admitted into the ports of California, and to regulate import duties. That war tariff, however, was abandoned as soon as the military governor had received from Washington information of the exchange and ratification of the treaty with Mexico, and duties were afterwards levied in conformity with such as Congress had imposed upon foreign merchandise imported into the other ports of the United States, Upper California having been ceded by the treaty to the United States.

"This last was done with the assent of the Executive of the United States, or without any interference to prevent it. Indeed, from the letter of the then Secretary of State, and from that of the Secretary of the Treasury, we can not doubt that the action of the military governor of California was recognized as allowable and lawful by Mr. Polk and his Cabinet. We think it was a rightful and correct recognition under all the circumstances, and when we say rightful, we mean that it was constitutional, although Congress had not passed an act to extend the collection of tonnage and import duties to the ports of California."

Continuing the discussion, the court further says (192 et seq.):

"Having considered and denied the claim of the plaintiffs to a restoration of the duties paid by them from the date of the treaty up to the time when official notice of its ratification and exchange were received in California, we pass on to the examination of their claim from that time until the revenue system in respect to tonnage and import duties had been put into practical operation in California by Colonel Mason, on the 7th of August, 1848. Up to this time it must be remembered that Captain Folsom, of the Quartermaster's Department of the Army, had been the collector of duties under the war tariff.

"On the 9th of August he was informed by Lieutenant Halleck, of the Engineer Corps, who was the secretary of state of the civil government of California, that he would be relieved as soon as a suitable citizen could be found for his successor. He was also told that 'the tariff of duties for the collection of military contributions was immediately to cease, and that the revenue laws and tariff of the United States will be substituted in its place.' The view taken by Governor Mason of his position has been given in our statement. The result was to continue the existing government, as he had not received from Washington definite instructions in reference to the existing state of things in California.

"His position was unlike anything that had preceded it in the history of our country. The view taken of it by himself has been given in the statement in the beginning of this opinion. It was not without its difficulties, both as regards the principle upon which he should act and the actual state of affairs in California. He knew that the Mexican inhabitants of it had been remitted by the treaty of peace to those municipal laws and usages which prevailed among them before the territory had been ceded to the United States, but that a state of things and population had grown up during the war, and after the treaty of peace, which had made some other authority necessary to maintain the rights of the ceded inhabitants and of immigrants from misrule and violence. He may not have comprehended fully the principle applicable to what he might rightly do in such a case, but he felt rightly and acted accordingly. He determined, in the absence of all instruction, to maintain the existing government.

"The territory had been ceded as a conquest, and was to be preserved and governed as such until the sovereignty to which it had passed had legislated for it. That sovereignty was the United States, under the Constitution, by which power had been given to Congress to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States, with the power also to admit new States into this Union, with only such limitations as are expressed in the section in which this power is given. The government, of which Colonel Mason was the executive, had its origin in the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered territory. It had been instituted during the war by the command of the President of the United States. It was the government when the territory was ceded as a conquest, and it did not cease as a matter of course, or as a necessary consequence of the restoration of peace.

"The President might have dissolved it by withdrawing the Army and Navy officers who administered it, but he did not do so. Congress could have put an end to it, but that was not done. The right inference from the inaction of both is that it was meant to be continued until it had been legislatively changed. No presumption of a contrary intention can be made. Whatever may have been the causes of delay, it must be presumed that the delay was consistent with the true policy of the Government; and the more so, as it was continued until the people of the Territory met in convention to form a State government, which was subsequently recognized by Congress under its power to admit new States into the Union.

"In confirmation of what has been said in respect to the power of Congress over this Territory, and the continuance of the civil government established as a war right until Congress acted upon the subject, we refer to two of the decisions of this court, in one of which it is said in respect to the treaty by which Florida was ceded to the United States: 'This treaty is the law of the land, and admits the inhabitants of Florida to the enjoyment of privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States. It is unnecessary to inquire whether this is not their condition, independently of stipulations. They do not, however, participate in political power—they do not share in the Government until Florida shall become a State.

"In the meantime Florida continues to be a Territory of the United States, guarded by virtue of that clause in the Constitution which empowers Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the Territory or other property belonging to the United States. Perhaps the power of governing a Territory belonging to the United States, which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the means of self-government, may result necessarily from the facts that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State, and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States. The right to govern may be the natural consequences of the right to acquire territory." (American Insurance Co. vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 542, 543.)

"The court afterwards, in the case of the United States vs. Gratiot (14 Peters, 526), repeats what is said in the case of Canter in respect to that clause of the Constitution giving to Congress the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States.

"Colonel Mason was fortunate in having his determination to continue the existing government sustained by the President of the United States and the Secretaries of his Cabinet, and nothing but an almost willing misunderstanding of the circular of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Walker, could have caused a doubt as to the liability of importers of foreign goods into California to pay duties upon them.

"That part of the Secretary's circular relating to the duties is in our statement of the case. It will show that the Secretary says no more than this: That as Congress had not brought California by law within the limits of any collection district, or authorised the appointment of officers to collect the revenue accruing upon the importation of foreign dutiable goods into that Territory, that his Department may be unable to collect them. Revenue accruing upon the importation into California of foreign dutiable goods means that the goods were liable to pay the duty. There is nothing uncertain in the Secretary's circular. It does not warrant in any way the declaration that it was his opinion that the goods were not dutiable or that they might not be legally collected, though that could not be done by the instrumentality of officers of a collection district.

"Our conclusion, from what has been said, is that the civil government of California, organized as it was from a right of conquest, did not cease or become defunct in consequence of the signature of the treaty or from its ratification. We think it was continued over a ceded conquest without any violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States; and that until Congress legislated for it the duties upon foreign goods imported into San Francisco were legally demanded and lawfully received by Mr. Harrison, the collector of the port, who received his appointment, according to instructions from Washington, from Governor Mason.

"But it was assumed in the argument, and not without force and ingenuity, and with some appearance of authority, that duties did not accrue to the United States upon foreign goods brought into California between the 3d of February, 1848, and the 3d of March, 1849, and from the last date until the 12th of November, 1849, and that the exaction of them was illegal. The two first dates mentioned comprehend the time between the date of the treaty and the date of the act of Congress, which included California within one of the collection districts of the United States, and the other date comprehends the time from the date of the act of Congress until Mr. Collier, the collector, entered upon the duties of his office. It was also said by counsel that as there was no treaty or law enjoining or permitting the collection of the duties, the exaction of them by the defendant was illegal.

"It was said that the duties were illegally exacted because the laws of a ceded country, including those of trade, remained unchanged until the new sovereignty of it changed them, and that this Congress had not done. That the practice of the United States had been not to collect duties upon importations upon goods brought into a ceded territory until Congress passed an act for it to be done. Louisiana and Florida were the instances cited; and the ratification by North Carolina and Rhode Island of the Constitution of the United States were also mentioned as having been the subjects of special legislation to bring them within the operation of the revenue laws which had been passed by Congress.

"And it was said that as Congress has the constitutional power to regulate commerce, and had not done so specifically in respect to tonnage and import duties in California, none of the existing acts of Congress for such purposes could be applied there until Congress had passed an act giving to them operation, and had legislated California into a collection district, with denominated ports of entry.

"This last being the most important of the objections which were made, we will examine it first and afterwards notice those which precede it. The objection assumes that under the laws then in force duties could not be collected in California after the war with Mexico had been concluded by a treaty of peace, and that the President had no legal authority to order the collection of duties there upon foreign goods, or power to enforce any revenue regulations, or to prevent the landing of goods prior to the passage of the act by which our revenue laws were extended to California and before proper officers had been appointed to execute those laws.

"It has already been shown that for seven months of the time the duties received were paid under the war tariff, and that the treaty, though signed in 1848, did not become operative until the ratifications and exchanges of it. And further, that it could not have any effect upon the existing government of California until official information of those ratifications had been received there. The belligerent right of the United States to make a civil government in California when it was done, and to authorise it to collect tonnage and impost duties whilst the war continued is admitted.

"It was urged that our revenue laws covered only so much of the territory of the United States as had been given to prevent the landing of foreign goods or to charge duties upon them, though such landing had been made within the territorial limits of the United States. To this it may be successfully replied that collection districts and ports of entry are no more than designated localities within and at which Congress had extended a liberty of commerce in the United States, and that so much of its territory as was not within any collection district must be considered as having been withheld from that liberty.

"It is very well understood to be a part of the laws of nations that each nation may designate, upon its own terms, the ports and places within its territory for foreign commerce, and that any attempt to introduce foreign goods elsewhere within its jurisdiction is a violation of its sovereignty. It is not necessary that such should be declared in terms, or by any decree or enactment, the expressed allowances being the limit of the liberty given to foreigners to trade with such nation. Upon this principle the plaintiffs had no right of trade with California with foreign goods, excepting from the permission given by the United States under the civil government and war tariff which had been established there; and when the country was ceded as a conquest, by a treaty of peace, no larger liberty to trade resulted.

"By the ratifications of the treaty California became a part of the United States. And as there is nothing differently stipulated in the treaty with respect to commerce, it became instantly bound and privileged by the laws which Congress had passed to raise a revenue from duties on imports and tonnage. It was bound by the eighteenth section of the act of 2d of March, 1799. The fair interpretation of the second member of the first sentence is that ships coming from foreign ports into the United States were not to be permitted to land any part of their cargoes in any other than in a port of delivery confined then to the ports mentioned in the act, afterwards applicable to all other places which might be made ports of entry and delivery, and excluding all right to unlade in any part of the United States which had not been made a collection district with ports of entry or delivery.

"The ninety-second section of that act had four objects in view. First, to exclude foreign goods subject to the payment of duties from being brought into the United States, except in the localities stated, otherwise than by sea; next, that they were not to be brought by sea in vessels less than 30 tons burden; and third, to subject to forfeiture any foreign goods which might be landed at any other port or place in the United States than such as were designated by law; fourth, to exclude the allowances or drawback of any duties of foreign goods exported from any district in the United States otherwise than by sea, and in vessels less than 30 tons burden. The sixty-third section also of that act, directing when tonnage duties, were to be paid, became as imperative in California after its cession to the United States as it was in any collection district.

"The acts of the 30th of July, 1790 (1 Stat. L., 130, chapter 30), and that of 2d March, 1799 (1 Stat. L., 627, chapter 22), were also of force in California without other special legislation declaring them to be so. It can not very well be contended that the words 'entered in the United States' give an exemption from them on account of the word 'entered,' because a ship has been brought into a port in the United States where an entry can not be made, as it may be done in a collection district. The goods must be entered before a permit for delivery can be given. Shall one then be permitted to land goods in any part of the United States not in a collection district, because he has voluntarily gone there with his vessel where an entry of his goods can not be made; or to say, 'I know that my goods can not be entered where I am, and therefore claim the right to land them for sale and consumption free of duty?'

"It has been sufficiently shown that the plaintiffs had no right to land their foreign goods in California at the times when their ships arrived with them, except by a compliance with the regulations which the civil government were authorized to enforce, first, under a war tariff, and afterwards under the existing tariff act of the United States. By the last, foreign goods, as they are enumerated, are made dutiable. They are not so because they are brought into a collection district, but because they are imported into the United States. The tariff act of 1846 prescribes what that duty shall be.

"Can any reason be given for the exemption of foreign goods from duty because they have not been entered and collected at a port of delivery? The last become a part of the consumption of the country as well as the others. They may be carried from the point of landing into collection districts within which duties have been paid upon the same kinds of goods, thus entering, by the retail sale of them, into competition with such goods and with our own manufactures and the products of our own farmers and planters. The right claimed to land foreign goods within the United States at any place out of a collection district, if allowed, would be a violation of that provision in the Constitution which enjoins that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

"Indeed, it must be very clear that no such right exists, and that there was nothing in the condition of California to exempt importers of foreign goods into it from the payment of the same duties which were chargeable in the other ports of the United States. As to the denial of the authority of the President to prevent the landing of foreign goods in the United States out of a collection district, it can only be necessary to say, if he did not do so, it would be a neglect of his constitutional obligation 'to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.'

"We will here briefly notice those objections which preceded that which has been discussed. The first of them, rather an assertion than an argument—that there was neither treaty nor law permitting the collection of duties—has been answered, it having been shown that the ratifications of the treaty made California a part of the United States, and that as soon as it became so, the Territory became subject to the acts which were in force to regulate foreign commerce with the United States, after those had ceased which had been instituted for its regulation as a belligerent right.

"The second objection states a proposition larger than the case admits, and more so that the principle is, which secures to the inhabitants of a ceded conquest the enjoyment of what had been their laws before, until they have been changed by the new sovereignty to which it had been transferred. In this case foreign trade had been changed in virtue of a belligerent right before the territory was ceded as a conquest, and after that had been done by a treaty of peace, the inhabitants were not remitted to those regulations of trade under which it was carried on while they were under Mexican rule, because they had passed from that sovereignty to another, whose privilege it was to permit the existing regulations of trade to continue and by which only they could be changed.

"We have said in a previous part of this opinion that the sovereignty of a nation regulated trade with foreign nations, and that none could be carried on except as the sovereignty permits it to be done. In our situation that sovereignty is the constitutional delegation to Congress of the power 'to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.'

"In respect to the suggestion that it has not been the practice of the United States to collect duties upon importations of foreign goods into a ceded territory until Congress had passed an act for that purpose, counsel cited the cases Louisiana and Florida.

"The reply is, that the facts in respect to both have not been recollected. There was no forbearance in either instance in respect to duties upon imports until Congress had acted. Louisiana was ceded by a treaty bearing the date of the 30th of April, 1803, but the possession of it by the United States depended upon the terms of final ratifications by the parties to it, and upon the delivery of it by a commissioner to be appointed by the French government to receive the transfer from Spain to France and by him to be immediately transferred to the United States. (Articles I, II, IV, V.)

"The surrender from Spain to France was formally made on 30th of November, 1803, and that to the United States was done on the 20th of December, 1803. It was known in Washington, by a letter from the commissioner appointed to receive it, early in January. It is said that from that time until the act of the 24th of February, or, as was provided for in the act, until thirty days after, Louisiana was not considered, in a fiscal sense, as a part of the United States; and that duties were not only not collected by the United States on importations into Louisiana, but that duties were charged on goods brought from Louisiana into the United States.

"It seems to have been forgotten that our commercial intercourse with Louisiana had been the subject of legislation by Congress in several particulars from the year 1800, and that before the revenue system could be applied it was necessary to repeal that special legislation. Mr. Gallatin, in his report of the 25th of October, 1803 (American State Papers, Finance, volume 2, 48), suggested that it should be done. Congress, however, did not do so until the act of the 24th of February, 1804, was passed, by the third section of which the repeal was effected. The postponement of the operation of the act for thirty days longer was with the view to prevent any conflict of rights or interests between what would be the new regulations of commerce under the act and those which had preceded them.

"It is only necessary to say as to Florida that the treaty of the 22d of February, 1819, was not ratified by the United States until the 19th of February, 1821. In a few days afterwards the act was passed extending our revenue system to it, subject to the stipulation in the fifteenth article of the treaty in favor of Spanish vessels and their cargoes. There was then no interval in either instance where duties were not collected upon foreign importations because Congress had not legislated for it to be done.

"The application of the revenue acts to North Carolina and Rhode Island, when those States had ratified the Constitution of the United States, though that was not done until the Constitution had been ratified by eleven of the States, does not support the position taken by the counsel of the plaintiff in error. Those States had been parties to the Confederation, and North Carolina was represented in the convention which formed the Constitution. It was to become the Government of the Union when ratified by nine States, and Congress declared that it should go into operation on the 4th day of March, 1789. The subsequent ratifications by North Carolina and Rhode Island made them parties in the Government. It brought them in without new forms or legislation, and their Senators and Representatives were admitted into Congress upon the presentation of their ratifications.

"Special acts were passed to apply to them the previous legislation of Congress, and that of the revenue acts, as a matter of course, because, previously to the ratification, those States had not been attached to any collection district. But it was not supposed by anyone that after those States had ratified the Constitution, that foreign goods could have been imported into them without being subject to duty, or that it was necessary to make them collection districts to make such importations dutiable.

"But we do not hesitate to say that if the reasons given for our conclusions in this case were not sound that other considerations would bring us to the same results. The plaintiffs carried these goods voluntarily into California, knowing the state of things there. They knew that there was an existing civil government instituted by the authority of the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and naval forces of the United States; that it had not ceased when these first importations were made; that it was afterwards continued and rightfully, as we have said, until California became a State; that they were not coerced to land their goods, however they may have been to pay duties upon them; that such duties were demanded by those who claimed the right to represent the United States—who did so, in fact, with most commendable integrity and intelligence; that the money collected has been faithfully accounted for, and the unspent residue of it received into the Treasury of the United States; and that the Congress has by two acts adopted and ratified all the acts of the government established in California upon the conquest of that territory, relative to the collection of imposts and tonnage from the commencement of the late war with Mexico to the 12th November, 1849, expressly including in such adoption the moneys raised and expended during that period for the support of the actual government of California after the ratification of the treaty of peace with Mexico. This adoption sanctions what the defendant did. It does more. It affirms that he had legal authority for his acts. It coincides with the views which we have expressed in respect to the legal liability of the plaintiff for the duties paid by them and the authority of the defendant to receive them as collector of the port of San Francisco.

"From these circumstances the law will not imply an assumption upon the part of the defendant to repay the money received by him from them for duties; the plaintiffs knew when they paid him that the defendant received them for the United States. The plaintiffs have no claim for damages against the defendant in justice or equity. They paid duties to which the United States had rightful claim, and no more than the law required. The plaintiffs have paid no excess. The moneys were paid under no deceit, no mistake; the defendant has honestly paid them over to the United States, has been recognized as their agent when he acted as collector, and is not responsible to the plaintiffs in foro conscientiæ.

"The moneys were paid from a portion of the funds in the Treasury of the United States, subject to the constitutional restriction that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law for such purposes as the Constitution permits. Our conclusion is, that the rulings made in this case in the circuit court are correct. We shall direct the judgment to be affirmed."

The decision is so apposite to the questions under consideration that argument is not needed to show its controlling force thereover.

In the case of Fleming et al. vs. Page (9 How., 603) the United States Supreme Court held:

"During the war between the United States and Mexico, the port of Tampico, in the Mexican State of Tamaulipas, was conquered, and possession of it held by the military authorities of the United States, acting under the orders of the President.

"The President acted as a military commander prosecuting a war waged against a public enemy by the authority of his Government, and the conquered country was held in possession in order to distress and harass the enemy.

"It did not thereby become a part of the Union. The boundaries of the United States were not extended by the conquest.

"Tampico was therefore a foreign port within the meaning of the act of Congress passed on the 30th of July, 1846, and duties were properly levied upon goods imported into the United States from Tampico.

"In this case the court announce the well-understood doctrine that the boundaries of the United States do not advance with its successful invading armies nor retreat before a victorious foe; that accessions to our territorial domain from foreign sovereignties must be acquired by the exercise of the treaty-making power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. Until Congress exercises that power and the treaty is duly made, ratified, and such ratification mutually exchanged, the territory remains foreign. The decision of the court on this branch of said case supports the answers made herein to the questions under consideration, for Porto Rico has become a part and parcel of the United States by a treaty duly made, ratified by Congress, and such ratifications mutually exchanged."

The court further say in said opinion (Id., page 616):

"Again, there was no act of Congress establishing a custom-house at Tampico, nor authorizing the appointment of a collector; and consequently there was no officer of the United States authorized by law to grant the clearance and authenticate the coasting manifest of the cargo in the manner directed by law, where the voyage is from one port of the United States to another. The person who acted in the character of collector in this instance acted as such under the authority of the military commander and in obedience to his orders; and the duties he exacted and the regulations he adopted were not those prescribed by law, but by the President in his character of Commander in Chief.

"The custom-house was established in an enemy's country as one of the weapons of war. It was established not for the purpose of giving to the people of Tamaulipas the benefits of commerce with the United States, or with other countries, but as a measure of hostility and as a part of the military operations in Mexico; it was a mode of exacting contributions from the enemy to support our Army, and intended also to cripple the resources of Mexico, and make it feel the evils and burdens of the war. The duties required to be paid were regulated with this view, and were nothing more than contributions levied upon the enemy, which the usages of war justify when an army is operating in the enemy's country. The permit and coasting manifest granted by an officer thus appointed, and thus controlled by military authority, could not be recognized in any port of the United States, as the documents required by the act of Congress when the vessel is engaged in the coasting trade, nor could they exempt the cargo from the payment of duties."

This was an accurate statement of the facts and the laws applicable thereto as regards the status of Tampico under military occupation by the armies of the United States, which status continued during the entire period under consideration by the court.

The facts and their legal effect were similar in the instance of California from 1847 to August 6, 1848, the date when notice of the treaty with Mexico reached the United States forces holding military possession there. Thereupon a change was effected.

The government of civil affairs there existing was divested of its military attributes. It ceased to derive its authority from the laws and usages of war and to exercise its powers in accordance therewith. It became subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States. It derived its authority therefrom and exercised such authority in accordance therewith.

As is said by our Supreme Court:

"Every nation acquiring territory, by treaty or otherwise, must hold it subject to the Constitution and laws of its own government." (Pollard's Lessee vs. Hagan, 3 How., 212, 225; Vattel's Law of Nations, book 1, chapter 19, sections 210, 244, 250, and book 2, chapter 7, section 80.)

To reiterate the language of the court in Cross et al. vs. Harrison (16 How., 164):

"By the ratification of the treaty California became a part of the United States. And as there is nothing differently stipulated in the treaty with respect to commerce it became instantly bound and privileged by the laws which Congress had passed to raise a revenue from duties on imports and tonnage." (Id., 197.)

It may be true, as stated by the court in the above quotation from Fleming et al. vs. Page, that—

"The permit and coasting manifest granted by an officer thus appointed and thus controlled by military authority could not be recognized in any port of the United States as the documents required by the act of Congress when the vessel is engaged in the coasting trade." (Id., page 616.)

This objection extends only to officers of a military government in a foreign territory, sustained by the authority of an existing war. But the government now existing in Porto Rico is no longer of such character. Its officers are no longer "thus controlled by military authority." That is to say, by the rights of a belligerent in war, and under our form of government entirely free from the control of Congress. It is now a civil government, subject to and controlled by the Constitution and Federal laws of the United States.

The Constitution and Congressional enactments are in force in that island, "though at this moment some part of the machinery necessary to their complete action is wanting." This civil government owes its inception to the rights of war; but which civil government on earth does not? It was the only government of civil affairs in the island when Porto Rico was ceded to the United States. Being a government de facto, it was continued in authority. It was a government which, as the Supreme Court say (16 How., page 190), "had its origin in the lawful exercise of a belligerent right over a conquered territory. It had been instituted during the war by the command of the President of the United States. It was the government when the territory was ceded as a conquest, and it did not cease as a matter of course, or as a necessary consequence of the restoration of peace."

The officers now discharging the functions of said government are de facto officers at least. The acts of de facto officers are legal and binding. (Husey vs. Smith, 99 U. S., 20; County of Ralls vs. Douglas, 105 U. S., 728; Cocke vs. Halsey, 16 Pet., 71; State vs. Carroll, 38 Conn., 449; Sheehan's Case, 129 Mass., 445.)

The course pursued in California as to permits and coasting manifests, as shown by instructions issued to the collector of the port of San Francisco, September 25, 1848, was to forward applications for registry to Washington and grant a sea letter of license, which would enable the vessel to wear the American flag and engage in trade as an American vessel. (Senate Document No. 18, first session Thirty-first Congress, pages 647, 648, War Department, No. 557.)

Said sea letters or permits were issued by collectors of ports and approved by the governor. A number of them were issued by the collectors of the ports of California. The following is a copy of one such permit. (See Senate Document No. 18, first session, Thirty-first Congress, page 609, War Department, No. 557.)

To all whom it may concern:

Whereas Thomas O. Larkin and Jacob Leese, citizens of the United States resident in California, sole owners of the American-built vessel Eveline, of Boston, whereof John B. B. Cooper is at present master, and is a citizen of the United States, have this day made oath to these facts, and that no foreign citizen or subject has any share by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise in said vessel:

Therefore, this said vessel Eveline is hereby authorized to wear the American flag and to enjoy all the privileges and immunities pertaining thereto, both with respect to coast trade and foreign commerce.

Given under my hand and seal, at the port of Monterey, this — day of February, 1849.

HENRY S. BURTON, Collector.

R. B. MASON, Governor of California.

In support of the declaration that the officers of the military government of Tampico, a government in foreign territory and deriving authority from an existing war, could not grant clearance and authenticate the coasting manifest of the cargo, the court further say, in Fleming vs. Page (9 How., page 616 et seq.):

"This construction of the revenue laws has been uniformly given by the administrative department of the Government in every case that has come before it. And it has, indeed, been given in cases where there appears to have been stronger ground for regarding the place of shipment as a domestic port. For after Florida had been ceded to the United States, and the forces of the United States had taken possession of Pensacola, it was decided by the Treasury Department that goods imported from Pensacola before an act of Congress was passed erecting it into a collection district, and authorizing the appointment of a collector, were liable to duty.

"That is, that although Florida had by cession actually become a part of the United States and was in our possession, yet under our revenue laws its ports must be regarded as foreign until they were established as domestic by act of Congress; and it appears that this decision was sanctioned at the time by the Attorney-General of the United States, the law officer of the Government. And although not so directly applicable to the case before us, yet the decisions of the Treasury Department in relation to Amelia Island and certain ports in Louisiana, after that province had been ceded to the United States, were both made upon the same grounds.

"And in the latter case, after a custom-house had been established by law at New Orleans, the collector at that place was instructed to regard as foreign ports Baton Rouge and other settlements still in the possession of Spain, whether on the Mississippi, Iberville, or the seacoast. The Department, in no instance that we are aware of since the establishment of the Government, has ever recognized a place in a newly acquired country as a domestic port from which the coasting trade might be carried on, unless it had been previously made so by act of Congress.

"The principle thus adopted and acted upon by the executive department of the Government has been sanctioned by the decisions in this court and the circuit courts whenever the question came before them."

So much of the foregoing statement of the court as relates to the territory embraced in the Louisiana purchase and the treaty with Spain fixing the boundary lines regarding Florida is shown by the court itself in the later case of Cross et al. vs. Harrison (16 How., 199, 200) to have no application to the question under consideration. (See pages 19-20 of this memorandum.)

The official correspondence of the State, Treasury, and War Departments of President Polk's Administration, set forth herein, shows that the court was without accurate information in concluding as a matter of fact that the Department has never recognized a place in a newly acquired country as a domestic port unless it had been previously made so by act of Congress. It was certainly done in the instance of California.

The decision in Fleming vs. Page (9 How., 603) was right in holding that Tampico, Mexico, was a foreign port during its occupancy by the military forces of the United States, as the boundaries of this country do not follow the fortunes of its armies. This was the real question in the case. Beyond the determination of this question, the opinion is obiter dictum and must give way to the later decision in Cross et al. vs. Harrison (16 How., 164).

Respectfully submitted,

CHAS. E. MAGOON,
Law Officer, Division of Customs and Insular Affairs, War Department.

MAY 30, 1899.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a few remarks upon one of the features of this bill, and to enter my protest against the unseemly haste with which this very important measure is being rushed through the House. Twenty pages of this bill deals with the civil government of Porto Rico, a question which has never been discussed in this House. It is the first attempt to legislate for any one of the islands ceded to this country by Spain, and we are asked to pass it without opportunity for either discussion or amendment. The bill violates every principle of our form of government. It sets up an oligarchy, a form of government in no sense republican. It practically hands over to the President of the United States the government of this island which he will rule through the executive council, the members of which he will appoint, as provided for in the eighteenth section of the bill. Six members of this council are to be appointed from such persons as the President may choose, five of its members are to be "native inhabitants" of Porto Rico, whatever that may mean.

This executive council is to constitute the upper house of the Porto Rico legislative assembly, and upon it is conferred by this act all the powers necessary to defeat the will of the people. The people of Porto Rico will be powerless in the hands of this executive council, responsible to no one but the President, more than half of whom will not be citizens of Porto Rico. No such high-handed act of imperialism has been committed by the President himself, and that the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States should force such a government on a part of the people of this country is enough to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every American who respects himself and the principles of the Government under which he lives. The passage of this bill means the beginning of the reign of the carpetbagger and the scalawag in Porto Rico. It means for those people a long and desperate struggle to free themselves from the wretched conditions which the provisions of this bill will bring upon them. Upon this executive council is conferred the power (section 29) of prescribing qualifications of voters, and regulations and restrictions as to the registration of voters, a most dangerous departure from principle and an outrageous exercise of power by this Congress against the liberties of the citizens of the United States.

If the people of this country want evidence of the determination of the Republican party to convert this Republic into an empire, behold here is the first overt act, openly avowed, seriously defended, and deliberately made a part of the policy of the Republican party. Neither local interests nor party expediency can excuse to the American people the vote of any Representative upon this floor who votes for this bill. It has ceased to be a question of tariff or free trade only; it has become a question of whether or not the representatives of the people of the United States here assembled will vote for a bill which denies the right of self-government to a portion of the people of the United States; will vote for a measure which defies every principle of our Government and opens the way for all the islands ceded to us by Spain to be governed contrary to the form and substance of a republican government. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, one of the hopes which I had when these new and larger national questions superseded the debates of 1896 was that they would be conducted in a better atmosphere, with a larger charity, with a higher patriotism than the political debates through which we passed four years ago.

I regret that many things have happened at the threshold of our new national experience which have tended at least to disappoint these hopes. We are here to-day in an atmosphere of acrimony, of accusation, of evil surmises, of recrimination, which, with all respect to those who have participated in it, I undertake to say is not equal to the level and dignity of this great assembly nor of the great questions with which we have to do.

For myself I accord to every man the right to hold his opinion with all charity and with all generosity to every one who differs from me. [Applause on the Republican side.] It has been said that changes have been made in the opinions of men on this floor and in the executive offices of the Government, and we have just been treated as a final act of eloquence by the leader of the Democratic side of this House with a quotation from a law clerk in the Department of War, who is said to have been overruled by the great lawyer who presides over that Department.

Now, if I desired to cite the opinion of people who disagree with me, I should take the opinion of my friend from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL, who is an eminent lawyer at the bar where he practices, and of my friend from Maine, Mr. LITTLEFIELD, who is an eminent lawyer at the bar at which he practices and a great law orator in the forum where he now appears and shines. But I for one fail to see the point which my friend from Tennessee makes when he takes a subordinate law clerk in an Executive Department and reads an opinion rendered by him as to the constitutional powers and prerogatives of this Government.

Now, it has been asked here why people have changed their minds. I undertake to say that nobody has changed his mind in a substantial measure. I undertake to say that what we do here now is exactly what was in the minds of the men who advised the President in the preparation of his message to Congress last December. My friend from Tennessee says that we have departed from the opinion of General Davis. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he will take the opinion of General Davis on the question now pending in this House?

Several MEMBERS. Which opinion?

Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS. He has changed his opinion.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I was not addressing my friend from Illinois [Mr. JAMES R. WILLIAMS]. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he will accept the opinion of General Davis given in his official report?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If you will give us both opinions, I will take my choice. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. My friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has read here the latest utterance of General Davis. It differs in no way from the suggestions of his original report. I will read this opinion which appears in the report of General Davis to the Secretary of War. It is found on page 531 of House Document No. 2:

The island must, it is supposed, ultimately derive its principal revenue from internal taxation; but this can not be until a new scheme of taxation for the whole island can be worked out. This requires very careful consideration, and can not properly be done until the general policy to be pursued as to Porto Rico is determined.

In the closing sentences of his report to the Secretary of War he says, in the same House document, on page 557:

Regarding general legislation by Congress, it is recommended that trade between the United States and the island should be left as free as possible, and that the customs revenue collected here be left to the island temporarily as income for local expenditures.

As soon as a new local internal-revenue tax law can be framed and put into operation, the custom-house collections would inure to the general Treasury, but for a few years it will be very difficult to balance the budget without this aid.

Now, I submit to this House whether that is not exactly what this bill does. Will my friend take the opinion of Dr. Carroll?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before my friend gets away from General Davis, I wish to say that I have here his sworn testimony in which he recommends free trade between the United States and Porto Rico.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I have read from his official report to the Secretary of War. I now desire to call the gentleman's attention to the report made by Dr. Carroll, the special commissioner sent personally by the President to investigate Porto Rican affairs—a gentleman upon whose judgment in large measure the President relied in framing his message of last December. On page 392 of his report he says:

The taxes need a complete readjustment. The main dependence has been on the customs revenue, and must continue to be until the future government of the island is determined.

He goes on to say that—

It must be remembered that large sums will be needed almost immediately for the public schools and for various internal improvements indispensable to the development of Porto Rico.

And adds—

It would seem to be prudent not to revise the Porto Rican tariff so as very greatly to reduce the customs revenue, at least for the period ad interim—that is until the establishment of a fiscal system and civil government in the island of Porto Rico.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did not Dr. Carroll, as a witness before the Insular Committee, advocate free trade between the United States and Porto Rico?

Mr. DOLLIVER. He probably advocated ultimate free trade between Porto Rico and the United States exactly as this bill advocates it, but certainly he did not propose——

Mr. RICHARDSON rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that a gentleman occupying the floor must not be interrupted unless, through the Chair, his consent is first obtained.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Among the javelins of accusation and malice that have been hurled to and fro in this Chamber has been one to the effect that the policy of members of this House has been controlled by corporate and moneyed influence on the outside. I do not stop to deny an accusation like that. It is an unworthy thing to say, and it is a contemptible thing to be called upon to deny.

I now inquire, however, into some little matters with which the gentleman from Tennessee, who has been so free with his accusations and his epithets, is concerned. I accuse the gentleman from Tennessee of having introduced into this House a joint resolution the effect of which is to make an open present to the American Sugar Refining Company of $60,000,000 now annually paid by that company as duties on its imported sugars.

I hold in my hand his resolution which proposes to remove the customs duties now laid by the tariff law upon raw sugar, out of which that company manufactures refined sugar, and which it imports into the United States mainly from the island of Cuba. The resolution is as follows:

[H. J. Res. 181. Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

In the House of Representatives. February 19, 1900.

Mr. RICHARDSON introduced the following joint resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution to admit free of duty sugar, molasses, and everything entering into the manufacture of sugars from Porto Rico and Cuba.

Whereas a monopoly exists among sugar manufacturers, and in consequence enormous profits are being realized: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this resolution all kinds of sugars, molasses, and everything entering into the manufacture of sugars shall be admitted free of duty from Porto Rico and Cuba.

I accuse the chairman of the Democratic national committee of being in the same conspiracy, if you will permit me so to speak. I hold in my hand a proposed amendment offered by Senator JONES of Arkansas to the bill, now become a law, to give the proceeds of the present Porto Rican customs to the people of Porto Rico, an amendment which, if it had been passed, would have given to the American Sugar Refining Company $1,800,000, which they have already paid in cash into the Treasury of the United States on sugar imported from Porto Rico. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The proposed amendment is as follows:

[H. R. 9080. Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

In the Senate of the United States. March 15, 1900. Ordered to be printed.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. JONES of Arkansas to the bill (H. R. 9080) appropriating, for the benefit and government of Porto Rico, revenues collected on importations therefrom since its evacuation by Spain, and revenues hereafter collected on such importations under existing law, viz: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That all duties collected to this date upon articles imported into the United States from Porto Rico since the 11th day of April, 1899, the date of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace between Spain and the United States, be returned to the persons from whom they were collected, and from and after the passage of this act no duties shall be collected on articles coming from Porto Rico.

I do not accuse the gentleman from Tennessee of corruption. I entirely acquit him of that. I accuse him of a stupidity in dealing with practical affairs so dense, so serene, and calm that not a ray of light penetrates into the dungeon where it dwells. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] This measure, belied and misrepresented for weeks, is no longer on the defensive. It is a Republican measure, indorsed by the approved leaders of the party in both Houses and in every department of the Government.

I am sorry that we are not altogether united upon it in this Chamber, and I treat with good will and consideration every man whose opinions differ from mine upon it; but I exhort my Republican brethren and colleagues to stand side by side before a common and united enemy in this field skirmish preceding the Presidential campaign of 1900. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, after this long and unexampled conflict the bill which has been the subject of debate in the capital of the United States and throughout all its borders is about to pass into a law. The people of the United States will have a chance to render a verdict upon its merits, because when it becomes a law no paper will suppress a report which is an argument in its favor. No paper will dare to comment upon it without printing the law itself.

Mr. Speaker, I am willing, I am anxious, to submit this question to the common people of the United States. I have no fears as to the result, and the proudest act of my life has been my connection with this bill from start to finish. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Will the gentlemen yield for a question?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman does not yield for a question.

Mr. PIERCE of Tennessee. Which end of the gentleman's record is he proudest of, the free-trade end or the protection end? [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I will not reply as I might reply. I always pass by when I hear a bark of that kind coming from any source, on the street or in the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side and derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] This is no new doctrine as enunciated in this bill. Two years ago we passed an act annexing the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. I will read an extract or two from that act, for the education of gentlemen who voted for it and who now sit here howling upon the Democratic side of this House.

That said cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and that the said Hawaiian Islands and their dependencies be, and they are hereby, annexed as a part of the territory of the United States and subject to the sovereign dominion thereof, and that all and singular the property and rights hereinbefore mentioned are vested in the United States of America.

And these words were added:

Until legislation shall be enacted extending the United States customs laws and regulations to the Hawaiian Islands the existing customs relations of the Hawaiian Islands with the United States and other countries shall remain unchanged.

That went through this House without a comment or a protest. Not a constitutional lawyer on either side sought to raise any question as to the power of the United States Congress to enact such a law as that. For the past two years that law has been enforced without question, and we have collected upon the imports of the Hawaiian Islands, save such as were excepted by treaty, the full duties under the Dingley Act. No man has said that we were doing an injustice to the people of the Hawaiian Islands.

Only last week we passed an act concerning the Hawaiian Islands that came from the Senate. The Senate of the United States had put a provision in the bill to which I am about to refer, and the Committee on Territories in the House of Representatives, by the unanimous vote of the committee on both sides, have placed in that bill a tariff on every dollar's worth of goods formerly imported from any other country, not the product of Hawaii, that shall hereafter come into the United States.

Where, oh where, was the Constitution, gentlemen, when you voted for that bill? Where was the copy of the Constitution of my friend from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD]? Was he so anxious to compel the people of the Hawaiian Islands to drink their whisky in the groceries, the drug stores, and hotels, striking out only the saloons, that he could swallow his conscientious and constitutional scruples and still vote for this bill imposing this tariff on goods coming from the Hawaiian Islands? [Applause on the Republican side.] "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel." There was not a protest against this feature, from any quarter. "But, gentlemen, when we see a little political capital for us or for our party, or for us notwithstanding our party, if we can see it, we will go for it and leave conscientious scruples; we will pocket them and pocket our consciences, if it does not appear to hurt our own interest."

Now, Mr. Speaker, after that time the Attorney-General of the United States rendered his opinion, and that was on the 22d day of July, 1898. Why, long before the clerks of the War Department had been studying constitutional law, he held that the laws of the United States did not extend to the Hawaii Islands. He delivered that opinion to the Secretary of the Treasury and repeatedly rendered such opinions before we had had any treaty of peace, one of them before the Spanish war was hardly commenced. So it is no new doctrine.

But, Mr. Speaker, what are the objections to the bill aside from the constitutional scruples of which gentlemen talk so much? Why, they say that the President in his annual message recommended free trade. Have they ever stopped to read the message of the President? What did he say? Why, he said that these people had lost their markets for their products through our intervention; that they had lost their markets in Cuba, in Spain, and in Europe; that all these were closed against their products, and that it was our duty to provide a market for them; and that is just what we propose to do here. [Applause on the Republican side.] You quote what he said about free trade as an argument on the part of the President, but I say to you that every line of it is answered in this bill; every line that gives them a market for their sugar and for their tobacco such as has been given to no other people on God's earth.

Mr. Speaker, what does the other side propose? I can not stop to undertake to answer gentlemen who choose to interrupt me without my consent. Why, they go back and ask to have the tariff duties put upon all of the products coming from foreign powers to Porto Rico, and to extend the internal-revenue laws to that island, and to pay every dollar of it into the Federal Treasury and leave the poor people of Porto Rico to get along as best they can.

That is, what they propose. They have heard of the storm, of the desolation on the island; they have heard of the poverty of these people, but they say to them. "You must paddle your own canoe;" we will take these duties out of your products; we will impose upon you our own tariff laws and our war-revenue taxes upon your entire internal commerce; and all that we can drain from you in that way we will put into our pockets and leave you to recover the best way you can from the ravages of the storm and the conditions in which you find yourselves.

It has been said more than once during the course of this discussion that General Miles had pledged us in some sort of a moral way and that we are bound to keep faith with them in that regard. I deny it. What was the pledge given? He promised them the immunities and the blessings of American free government. Some one has possibly consulted the dictionary and found that the word "immunity" might be construed to mean freedom from taxation. Thus we are told that General Miles promised them immunity from taxation. Did he? Is that statement true? Not at all.

If they were to come in as an integral part of our Government, they would be subject to taxation; and in response to what General Miles promised, or pledged, if you will, we propose in this bill to tax them. How? For whose benefit? We propose, Mr. Speaker, to give back to them every dollar we get from taxation for their benefit, not reserving even the expense of collecting it, but bearing that expenditure ourselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Has any other people on the face of this earth even been so generously, so liberally, treated by a conquering power? Did we ever treat in the history of this country our own Territories so generously as this? Is there in that any possible ground of complaint against this treatment of these people?

Why, we simply say that on foreign goods they shall pay the tariff under the Dingley rates, and by this bill as it stands, when they send in their sugar and their tobacco to our markets, we will give you back 85 per cent of the Dingley rates for the purpose of booming your business; the other 15 per cent we will collect out of you gentlemen who have been living here in luxury for the last three or four months upon your prospective sugar profits. You who have been besieging this Hall, riding forth between the Arlington and the Capitol, we say to them we will compel you to pay the 15 per cent, and apply the amount which we receive in that way to the benefit of these poor people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Carry out in good faith the promises of General Miles. We do it, sir, absolutely by this bill. But you, by your substitute and your war-revenue act, seek to oppress and impoverish these people still further; and yet you talk here and you pretend now and say that in the name of humanity, for the good of the Porto Rican people and for their benefit you would defeat this bill because of your sentiment of love and pity for them! God deliver them from any such lovers and friends as you are to the poor people down there. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But, Mr. Speaker, the question has been asked, Why did the Committee on Ways and Means change its mind in this regard? So far as the record shows, I suppose I am the only member of the committee who did change his mind. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. RUSSELL] advocated a proposition similar to that now before the House long before I introduced a free-trade bill; so he did not have to change. How the other gentlemen stood on the committee I never knew or understood. I introduced the bill on my own volition, without conversation or consultation with any single member on the committee. I did it because I wanted to furnish that people with American markets for their products.

When I came to examine it, it only helped 20 per cent of their products and 10 per cent of the producers, and I found that it was not such a great boon to the island of Porto Rico after all. And when I came to examine into the internal-revenue features, I found it would tax to death poor people who were striving to earn a living in that poor island. I found 3,000 men manufacturing cigars in their little grocery stores and selling them out to the people. Put a retailer's license upon them, compel them to put them into a box and to put a st[illegible] one of them, and it would wipe every one of them out of existence at [illegible] que[illegible]

It would produce riot; it would produce confusion; it would produce an end of good order in the island of Porto Rico; I looked around in vain to find any way of taxation unless we did it under the features of this bill, by which we can go ahead and give to these people the blessings of our American civilization, building schoolhouses on every corner, putting a school-teacher there and teaching them not only the blessings of civilization but the blessings of liberty, the blessings of citizenship, that we may the sooner bring them up to the high standard that we can make American citizens of them all. That is one of the reasons why I changed my mind upon the subject; and what are the insinuations?

No man in this House has so discredited himself as to come out in the open and make the charge. The leader of the opposition came the nearest to it this morning. I should have thought fully as much of him if he had come out in a manly way and backed up these charges, than the manner they were slipped in here in the House of Representatives, in the sneaking, cowardly manner that they were this morning. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The general charge is that the sugar trust wants a tariff on sugar between Porto Rico and the United States of America. To state the proposition to any child over 5 years of age is enough to refute it. The sugar trust has been in favor always of free raw sugar coming into the United States, because that is their raw material. They have always wanted a protective duty on the refined sugar coming into the United States.

And then they trot out Oxnard and say he is the head of the sugar trust, with his sugar-beet factories with a capacity of 15,000 tons against 2,000,000 tons consumed in the United States, and they state that Oxnard wants a tariff on sugar. He has always wanted a tariff duty on sugar—on refined sugars and on raw sugars—because otherwise, if the raw sugar was free, with the little expense of refining, they would knock out every beet-sugar factory in the United States and every cane-sugar industry in the State of Louisiana.

Why, of course he wanted a duty on both. The sugar trust, always and for ever more, have demanded free sugar when it came here in the raw under 16 Dutch standard. That is what they want to-day. Mr. Havemeyer, president of the sugar trust, betrayed the object for which his company is working in an interview published in the Chicago Tribune recently. The article says:

> The sugar king, in discussing the whole situation, was plain and outspoken regarding the position of Porto Rico and the Philippines, and declared that there was no reason in the world why sugars should not be admitted free of duty from those countries. "I am much in favor of it," he said, "and I believe the time is not far off when they will be admitted free of duty. Why, both of those countries are part and parcel of the United States, and no matter what action Congress takes, I am confident the Supreme Court will hold that the products of those colonies are entitled to free entry here.
> "There is no more reason why a duty should be placed upon the products of Porto Rico than on stuff coming into New York from Long Island. There is only a wide ditch between the United States and Porto Rico. Well, if Porto Rican sugars are brought in free, it will not be long before some other similar policy is adopted with reference to Cuban products."

Mr. Speaker, I have not discussed all the questions that I should like to have discussed. They can not be discussed in a few hours' debate. They have been discussed over this country, and they will be discussed somewhat in the future; and yet I have to find a man, a Republican, however prejudiced against this bill, who, when he was fully informed as to what the bill did and the merit of it, was not enthusiastic in favor of it, unless he was a narrow, strict constructionist of the Constitution of the United States. [Loud applause.]

I am ready to answer to my constituents and give them an account of my stewardship; and I want you gentlemen on the other side of this question to be prepared to explain to the laborers of your districts how you come to vote for a constitutional proposition that will, if carried into effect, give free sugar from Porto Rico, free sugar from the islands of the sea, and at the same time establish the Constitution there, making citizens of 10,000,000 Filipinos, giving them the right to come here as contract laborers, destroying the high wages and thrift of your constituents and mine. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments in gross.

Mr. PAYNE. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. McRAE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McRAE. Have the Senate amendments been read to the House?

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Under the rule I desire to ask if it would be in order to make any motion to recommit this bill?

The SPEAKER. There is no motion in order except the motion to concur in gross in the Senate amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 153, answering "present" 11, not voting 26; as follows:

H. R. 1092. An act to set apart a portion of the Arlington estate for experimental agricultural purposes, and to place said portion under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Agriculture and his successors in office.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 223) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CULLOM, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. MORGAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. RICHARD P. BLAND, late a Representative from the State of Missouri.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended in order that fitting tribute be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives and to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolutions:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint on the production of the precious metals for the calendar year 1898, bound in cloth and wrapped; 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Resolved, That there also be printed 7,500 additional copies of the report of the Director of the Mint covering the operation of the mints and assay offices of the United States for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1899, to be bound in cloth and wrapped; 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Senate, and 3,000 for the use of the Director of the Mint.

Also:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed in black cloth binding and wrapped for mailing 5,000 copies of the national banking laws, for the use of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 2,500 additional copies of the Annual Report of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899; of which 250 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,750 copies for the use of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 7433) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1901, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THURSTON, Mr. PLATT of Connecticut, and Mr. JONES of Arkansas as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 12, 1900.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. BURROWS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

PAY OF ENLISTED MEN.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Paymaster-General of the Army, relative to all allotments of pay of enlisted men of the United States Army, under section 16 of act of Congress approved March 2, 1899, etc.; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SCHOONER WILLIAM AND JOSEPH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the vessel schooner William and Joseph, William Lander, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8245) temporarily to provide revenues for the relief of the island of Porto Rico, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 222) to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KNOX, Mr. HITT, and Mr. MOON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 445) for the relief of Clara M. Ashby, widow of W. W. Ashby, late United States consul at Colon;

A bill (H. R. 8876) granting the right of way to the Minnesota and Manitoba Railway Company, across the ceded portion of the Chippewa (Red Lake) Indian Reservation, in Minnesota; and

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 1677) granting an increase of pension to Missouri B. Ross; and

A bill (H. R. 1681) granting an increase of pension to Isaac M. Locke.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2303) granting an increase of pension to Lavinia M. Payne, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 104) to amend the joint resolution permitting Anson Mills, colonel of the Third Regiment United States Cavalry, to accept and exercise the functions of boundary commissioner on the part of the United States, approved December 12, 1893, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4032) to authorize the Ohio Valley Electric Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Big Sandy River from Kenova, W. Va., to Catlettsburg, Ky., reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4051) to authorize the Ohio Valley Electric Railway Company to construct a bridge over the Big Sandy River from Kenova, W. Va., to Catlettsburg, Ky., reported it with an amendment.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3305) to refer the claim of John S. Mosby against the United States for the value of certain tobacco to the Court of Claims, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CLAIMS OF CERTAIN STATES AND THE CITY OF BALTIMORE.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4024) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to reexamine and resettle the accounts of certain States and the city of Baltimore growing out of moneys expended by said States and city of Baltimore for military purposes during the war of 1812, to report it without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The bill was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. What committee has reported the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill seems to take in the history of the United States from the beginning up to the present time.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will permit me a moment, I can explain it to him satisfactorily.

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I will state that several times since I have been a member of this body and sometimes before this bill has passed here. I have never heard an objection to it from any member of the committee or from any member of the Senate. It is a bill that is well understood by gentlemen who have been here for many years. Its principle is simple. It simply directs that the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, and South Carolina and the city of Baltimore shall be placed upon the identical principle on which other States were settled with as to the expenditures for military purposes in the war of 1812.

The Government was in need of money. These States and the city of Baltimore expended considerable funds for military purposes. The debts were assumed by the Government, with interest. The method of computing interest was objected to in a formal protest of the States, and it has been rectified in a number of these cases; but as to the States mentioned in this bill the rule that was observed in Massachusetts and Maryland as to similar expenditures, and as to Maine in another matter, was not observed.

The language of this bill, as stated here by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who has at two sessions of the Senate reported it from the unanimous committee, is the identical language of the bills in the other cases; and I have never heard a single objection to the justice, the equity, the morality, or the propriety of this claim.

Mr. CULLOM. Have not these claims been adjudicated once or twice before?

Mr. DANIEL. They were not adjudicated, but settled by the Treasury in 1829 upon the principal. The method of interest calculations was protested against in a formal document, and whenever it has been asked by a State it has been corrected. As to Maryland and Massachusetts, such settlement as is asked in the other cases has been accomplished.

Mr. CULLOM. What amount of money will it probably take out of the Treasury?

Mr. DANIEL. It is a different sum as to different States?

Mr. CULLOM. Is there an estimate as to the amount to be paid each State?

Mr. DANIEL. There is an estimate in a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of December 17, 1890, to the President of the Senate. In the Fifty-first Congress, second session, the letter of the Secretary communicated the calculations of his Department as to the interest that would be due, as will be seen in Executive Document No. 17, Fifty-first Congress, second session.

I will state to my friend that in the State of Virginia it will involve no expenditure. That State is indebted to the United States. Congress has directed suits against States. In some cases it will involve no expense; but if it did, and wherever it does, it is a just expenditure. The Senator is the first one I have ever heard in this body who has taken any sort of exception to this claim. I know it is from proper motives. I am not criticising the Senator.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not desire to be considered as objecting to the bill——

Mr. DANIEL. No; I am not criticising the Senator in the least, but merely referring to that as an indication that the bill is unexceptionable.

Mr. CULLOM. But on hearing the bill read it seems to comprehend an adjustment of relations with the States to the Government in settlements that date back almost to the beginning of the country, and it would seem naturally that some of these things ought to be settled once for all.

Mr. DANIEL. There has been no lack of diligence in this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is not before the Senate. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I object; not that I am hostile to the bill, but I think a little time should be taken to look over it. Perhaps to-morrow I shall not object further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes to the Calendar.
